But his own and his friends' experience confirms what others reported. During the fair of 1880, your writer and a number of friends had reasonably good board at a moderate price. Of course, on arriving in 1881 at Omaha, we at once repaired to our old quarters and having honestly and promptly paid our bills the year before, we were again received, and although the price was raised, we would not complain if the fare had been as before, but, Mr. Editor, it was just miserable in quality and grandly diminutive in quantity, and ourselves having been treated that way, we are a little more inclined to lend a sympathizing ear to others.
