SEEING that state legislatures are having so much difficulty in electing U. S. senators, and their selections when made often fail to meet general approval, would it not be wise to let the people attend to this matter for themselves. They are quite as competent to act for themselves as to choose certain men to act for them. The expense of choosing a senator by popular vote would be slight in comparison with that attending these prolonged contests in state legislatures. Let the people insist on being allowed to choose their representatives in the upper branch of congress just as they choose members of the lower branch-by direct vote.
