As to the sentiment thus expressed by these eminent Dema war to free the colored people of the south. It may take another war this to say :

upon the perfectly obvious act that the matter is one with which the states severally are totally incapable of dealing. That they, acting severally, can make a law on any subject author of "Thoms' Navigator," a book for all, is an absolute and natural impossibility. That their several judicatures, standing independent of each other, could agree in their decisions upon different laws, or even upon a common law, is equally an absolute and natural impossibility. The evils, then, that are the offspring of different and conflicting local laws and judicatures, are beyond all possibility of remedy by any possible local action. Yet, the voice of mediaval Bourbonism proclaims that it is an exclusive function of the several provinces to perform the impossible!

It is monstrous because it is a dec laration that some of the worst evils that ever have appeared in any human society-evils that are corroding the social foundations, working corrup-tion of blood, attainting citizens without conviction or even accusation of crime, disestablishing justice and making its establishment impossible, to say nothing of the decay of public and private morality that is the inevitable encomitant, are without remedy. of Boaches, near Richland Center, It is not in the possible power of the local agencies to remedy them, because they are not local evils, but evils general to the whole nation. But, the national authority must not presume to deal with them, because it is a misty doctrine of primitive Bourbons that they are exclusively an affair of the local agencies! It is hard

Common sense and common decency hold a different opinion. Even the paper instrument to which Bourbon humbug is so extremely fond of appealing, compels a different opinion. It was enacted "to establish justice," not to prevent its establishment; to "promote the general welfare," not to it; to furnish a legal guaranty against the evils that medizval Bourpower to remedy them.
