> Cleanliness is All-Important to Their Preservation Cleanliness is all important in the preservation of the teeth. Perfectly clean teeth will not decay. Food remaining in contact with the teeth by ward of philanthropy such as his should certainly not be literally star-about them, is a very prolific source of caries or decay of the teeth. An article in the British Medical Journal says: "The general prevalence of dental caries is chiefly owing to food remaining on and between the teeth after meals from breakfast-time till the following morning, when according to custom the teeth are brushed; brushed, but probably not cleaned, as the brush is more often used to polish the surface merely than to assist in removing what has accumulated between them. Experiments have been referred to that depression on the masticating surface of these teeth, and on the broad walls of the molars, and these are the chief seats of caries. While mastication is performed by the molars and bicuspids, the upper front teeth remain free from food and caries; but when they themselves are made to do the work of lost or diseased molars, and the food gets between them, caries is certain to follow before long. Further proof can not be required that, if no food remained in contact with the teeth after eating, they would be free from caries. unless acted on by acidity from other sources. The only indications, therefore for the prevention of dental caries are the neutralization of acid applied to the teeth, and the removal of food before it has become acid." In conclusion it may be said that the greater part of the decay of teeth might be prevented by scrupulous cleanliness and attention to the diet. The teeth ought to be freed from all particles of food between them by the use of a wood or quill tooth-pick after each meal, and the use of the brush at least every night. It is advisable to use a little castile soap on the brush, which will neutralize any remaining acidity and assist in preventing decay.-Phrenological Journal.
