The mayor, by his vote, said that here are no houses of prostitution the city. It would have been more consistent with his course as mayor to have said that we have houses of prostitution among us, but for some reason (unknown to all good citizens) they are permitted to ply their nefarious business to the scandal and shame of the community It is preposterous to think that they would defy the city authorities to do their best to oust them from the place. Everybody that knows anything about it understands now, if they did not before, that the mayor of Columbus is (for some reason) in favor of tolerating these sinks of pollution in the city. Comment on such a state of affairs is not neces sary. It might have been gratifying, however, to some of the mayor's long-

I would like to have any councilman here get up now and chance to be official servants of the scum of the world, the dissolute of all tell me whether or not he knows of the existence of these sinks of pollution. If any man of ordinary intelligence who has lived in the city six months would Ottillia Maschen tell me that he did not know of the existence of this blot of shame, I would certainly tell him he was not an observ-ant man. I know that every man of us Belva Rice, Eddie Coan, Mattie Post, knows the situation, every official of the Grace Coffey, Mable Morrison, city, nine-tenths of the people, not excluding ladies of the city. There is no use in "beating around the bush" in this matter. Shall the laws of the state and the ordinance of the city be enforced according to the wishes of a large majority of our good people or will we disregard their petition in the face of a lot of harlots? Are we afraid of those rotten excrescences of bestial lust?

It seems to me the duty of this council is very clear. The state law is plain, our ordinance is definite and the supreme court has held that the only evidence needed is that proving the general reputation of these houses. Considering all the circumstances, if we do not do our duty we will be justly reprehended, as
