Conceit vs. Self-Confidence. A reasonable amount of conceit is pardonable, especially in professional men and artists. It is often very useful to them, nay more, while it has often helped many a one to put forth all his powers, it has also aided many an ignoramus to find his way through life, while otherwise he would have been trodden under foot. Conceit especially helps the youth and nature seems always to provide the young with a good amount of it. Were young people fully aware of their own deficiencies, were they able to measure the powers of their competitors or the greatness of the task before them, they would often shrink back in fear. As it is, their conceit carries them onward, and aided by it, they step where older men scarcely dare to set a foot. Tis true sometimes a young man perishes, as did the buffalo that tried to stop the train on the prairies, but then if one dies in an effort, there are thousands that succeed. Youth is generally conceited. Conceit, however, blinds us hence the errors as well as the daring deeds of youth. But as the bondage of conceit is loosened youth sees the world as it is, hence in the approaching years youth becomes more cautious and less daring. Conceit is in a measure pleasurable, as most delusions are. It may gratify our vanity to appear as a giant when comparing ourselves to the people we see in the valley below, while we stand on the mountain peak, but then the delusion is a harmless one. Gradually we learn to know the fact, that those who are now small are in reality just as large as we are, and that we in their eyes appear just as small as they did. With an increase of good common sense, conceit takes its flight, and for this blessing we should constantly ask. When the Scotch people pray that they might be blessed "With a canty conceit o' themselves," they do not mean to pray for the power of overestimating themselves, but a reasonable degree of self-reliance and self-confidence. Selfconfidence is not to be confounded with conceit. While the latter should be discouraged, the former should be encouraged. Schumann, who, by the way. was a very modest man, said "That selfreliance and confidence are special arts within art. Within his four walls," he says, "the artist should be modest with regard to himself and most conscientiously dilligent, but toward the public he must display courage,nay even a little gay boldness, and the fair one will yield." and generally has nothing wherewith to support his high opinion of himself; but the self-confident man knows his gifts, he trusts in them, he uses them judiciously and effectively, hence he generally succeeds. It may be difficult to draw the line that divides the two, but nevertheless there is such a line and the public generally can distinguish between

Self-confidence is not easily acquired. It may be cultivated but most generally it is inborn. The self-confident man dares to aim at the prize and often gains it while he who hesitates and doubts never wins anything. Teachers should see to it, that pupils overcome their fears and gain some self-confidence else they will never make successful players or singers in public, but they should also be very watchful, for selfconfidence is apt to lead into conceit. By cultivating self-confidence we must be careful not to let the pupil become superficial, and while it will be a good plan for young people to compare themselves with those beneath them, they should never cease to look upward. Selfconfidence is needed in all stations of life: it displays itself in men's looks and next meeting of the C. L. S. C. which motions, it speaks little of itself, but is meets at the residence of H. P. Coolidge, he who lacks self-confidence is an humble sort of a fellow, better designed to serve than to rule. He needs constant aid, advice and encouragement, and the
