Of course this claim is too absurd even to merit a serious refutation and it would not receive our attention here but for the fact that there are many students of music who are disposed to undervalue their teachers when they find they are unable to do what no great artist would profess to do. There may be men who are able to read aloud several pages of plain English without mistaking some words and omitting, transposing and mispronouncing others without entirely missing the meaning of some phrases and sentences, and misplacing the emphasis in some places there may be a few such readers in the world, but the writer has never heard even one. But this is not a fair analogy. Is there a man in the world who can at first sight make a translation of the most difficult Greek? If there is such a man, he has not yet been heard from. And yet it were easier to acquire such skill in Greek than to read difficult music in a faultless style. Perhaps the most wonderful reader of pianoforte music the world ever saw was Franz Liszt.
