the Watery Streets

We came in sight of the "towers domes and palaces" of Venice a little before night, Dec. 22. I had always thought of the city being built on a low hore, more as some of the cities in the Netherlands, but instead of that the bridge which took us over to the island on which the city is built, is two and a quarter miles long—the guide book says and passenger trains connect with the the longest in the world. It is certainly the longest I ever went over. I kept my head until I passed out of the long station with the crowd and then it began to swim. Instead of a long row of cabs and omnibuses which usually await incoming trains in large cities, were little queer black boats all along the dock, of labelled hotel porters stood in a row. I called for the hotel I wanted to reach, me into the boat and into a little coverthe inside of a city cab, not much unlike one with its cushioned seats and dreds of people walking about. I am side windows, only you enter from the front instead of the side. The carsman stepped behind the cover and we were fairy stories, but when we had crossed carrier pigeons, were enabled to take it der bridges and around corners, with piazza at public expense.
