be asked if much of the old forms of education, which are nowhere so promi-nently portrayed as on commencements, be got wholly obsolete. The old tradi-tions of educations still survive, and are difficult to eradicate. The great fault with the education of today is that it does not clear the skifts theroughly of is false notions. The world wants such an educational training as shall fit young years' course, to take up the business of prectical life without first being obliged after coming out of school, to begin all over again.
