It is a notable fact that the largest ye most obscure drawer in the stationary room connected with the Senate Chamber is the one in which sample corkscrews are kept. Of these sinuous aids to creature comfort or discomfort there s infinite variety. Many are novel, but the new and old have alike but one obect-to draw corks. Some of them are old-fashioned, and to secure good results the bottle wil have to be placed between the knees of the operator; the cork invariably comes out with a sharp "pop." Others pull the stopper from the orifice with a squeaking sound that has in i some of the elements which go to make up a long-drawn and noisy kiss, while still later specimens of man's ingenuity
