> For weeks "The Rag Baby" has been talked of till the people of the muchly worked city seemed last night to turn out en masse to see what was to be seen. The curtain rose amid the buzz of excitement, and when the upening characters made their appearance it seemed like the play was to be one of commonplace dialogue, but it was quickly changed as the different characters appeared. New and comic situations, songs, dances and dialogues were introduced, and when the curtain fell upon the first act the audience was convulsed with laughter and merriment. The second and third acts were something entirely new, and as bright and witty as could be wished, but the developments of the last act is what gives the main interest which holds the audience. To say the least, the company and play was more than had been expected, therefore none were disappointed. It will be some time before "The Rag Baby" is forgotten, and as the company is booked to return next season we can
