SETTLERS on timber claims will be glad to note the tenor of an opinion recently filed by the secretary of the interior, remarks the Nebraska Farmer. It puts on record a decision from the department to the effect that if a settler has honestly tried to live up to the requirements of the timber culture act he will be protected in the possession of his property though there is not a growing tree thereon. This is simply justice. A man cannot be held responsible under the adverse conditions of nature. The opinion is well taken and it sets a precedent that can safely be followed hereafter, and one, in fact, that was anticipated by the action of the last congress.

-A queer fact this season is the distance the water is below the surface in Schuyler. During former seasons one could dig a couple feet below the surface and strike water. Cellars had to be well cemented to keep the water out. This season the water in the city is at least ten feet below the surface as has been shown by digging for water works purposes. Cellars not cemented are perfectly dry. Last season it was nearly the same. The question now arises, is it owing to the unusually dry season or has the water dropped so much below the surface for all time? It is so great a change that attention to it is attracted. -{Schuyler Sun.
