—The Nebraska Farmer suggests that eggs should be gathered daily and placed in a box lined with something soft, turning each gently every day and keeping each sitting to itself. Nests for the sitting hens are best made on the ground, a place being hollowed out for the purpose, only deep enough to keep the eggs in place, and lined with a handful of soft grass. The hens should be set either in a large coop or pen, where they will be protected from rain and hot sun.

—A Fremont man said to the Herald the other day: "I have not seen a mulberry tree this spring that shows signs of life. The two in my yard are apparently dead as they will ever be, and the trees of two of my neighbors are in the same condition. I cannot account for the condition, unless the prolonged cold weather froze them to death." The non-appearance of leaves on the mulberry trees has caused somewhat similar talk here, but the general opinion is that the trees are not dead, receiving only a set-back by the late April freeze.

—Since the memorable co-star revival of Julius Caesar, when Lawrence Barrett and Edwin Booth joined forces and appeared as Cassius and Brutus, with Charles H. Booth as Mark Antony, the last named artist has done nothing which has pleased his
