Mr. McKelfresh is a graduate of the West Virginia law school and has passed the bar examination in Nebraska. Mr. McKelfresh will enter into a general law practice, making collections a specialty. He is qualified for the field which he has entered and already has a good collection business established.

It rained Tuesday night and therefore attaches a tale. A small fishing party went out to McPherson's Lake Tuesday morning. The party consisted of Otto Roen and Fin Howard and the Misses Eloise Roen and Nellie Evans. The day was ideal and the fish bit well. In fact they bit so well that the party was tempted to tarry till the last shadows faded away. They had not observed the threatening clouds gathering in the north, so interested were they in their own pleasures. Scarcely had they started when the wind arose and the floods came. They found shelter in the home of a friendly farmer, but not until all the shapeliness had been soaked out of the hats and gowns of the young ladies. The party arrived home safe the following morning, bearing all the marks of a bathing party returning from a plunge bath.

A single rose from a bouquet in the hands of a maiden with blushing face and melting eye affords a glimpse of paradise for the average young man. But what can be the spiritual state of the fellow who has a whole bouquet thrown at his feet, and that by a charming young lady whom he has never seen before and who is moved by a single glance at him through the open window of a moving Pullman car thus to deport herself? Conkating can answer the question, for he is the happy young man who encountered this experience at the Union Pacific station last night as No. 5 pulled out. Judge Hensley is one of several eye witnesses who can more than verify the above statement and he is willing to testify that the young lady was smiling and waving her handkerchief as the train departed with as much fervor as Con was blushing.
