

Entered at the Postoffice, Columbus, Nebr., as second-class mail matter.

PUBLISHED WEDNESDAYS BY
Columbus Journal Co.,
(INCORPORATED.)

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:
One year, by mail, postage prepaid.....$1.50
Six months...... .80
Three months...... .40

WEDNESDAY, DEC. 27, 1906.

FREDERICK E. ABBOTT, Editor.

RENEWALS—The date opposite your name on your paper, or wrapper shows to what time your subscription is paid. This Jan 1, 1907, shows that payment has been received up to Jan. 1, 1907. If you do not wish the Journal continued for another year, you should notify us at once, so that we may stop the paper at the time paid for has expired, you should previously notify us to discontinue it.

DISCONTINUANCES—Responsible subscribers will continue to receive this journal until the publishers are notified by letter to discontinue, when all arrears must be paid. If you do not wish the Journal continued for another year, you should notify us at once, so that we may stop the paper at the time paid for has expired, you should previously notify us to discontinue it.

CHANGE IN ADDRESS—When ordering a change in the address, subscribers should be sure to give their old as well as their new address.

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.

The Journal in its last issue of the old year comes before its readers with an announcement for the New Year which marks the most important step ever made in the evolution of the newspaper business in Columbus—a step for which the business men of Columbus and the advertising public of Platte County have been longing for years.

The Columbus Journal already enjoying the largest circulation of any newspaper in Platte County will acquire on January 1st, the subscription list, subscription accounts, advertising contracts and good will of the Platte County Argus and the Argus will be merged in the Journal and cease publication.

On the same day the Journal job plant and the good will of the Journal's job business will pass into the hands of B. B. Green, secretary and treasurer of the Columbus Printing and Specialty House, formerly editor and publisher of the Platte County Argus, and the Columbus Journal will cease to conduct a job business.

Columbus has always been the home of several good newspapers but it has never had a newspaper that has made profits commensurate with the energy expended in its publication. This is because the field here has always been occupied by too many newspapers and not because Columbus merchants have lacked in business enterprise which always finds expression in liberal advertising.

A year and a half ago when the writer assumed editorial management of the Journal, there were four English newspapers in Columbus. Believing at that time that the only solution of the newspaper problem in Columbus which would place the business on a paying basis was to reduce the number to two English papers, we made a start toward that solution by buying the Columbus Times published by Will B. Dale, on April 1, 1904, and added the circulation of the Times to that of the Journal.

Since that time we have worked continuously to bring about the consolidation of the Argus with the Journal which has just been consummated.

In acquiring the Argus we are not "buying a dead horse." The Argus, until the Journal made its campaign for subscribers, enjoyed the largest circulation among the farmers of any paper in Platte county. It is the official paper of the city and has always enjoyed a liberal advertising patronage.

The acquisition of the Argus subscription list will give the Journal a circulation of 2,000 for its first issue in 1906, and we have made plans by which we feel sure we can promise our advertisers a list of 2,500 within the next sixty days. This places the Journal among the first country newspapers in Nebraska in point of circulation and for the first time in the history of Platte county offers an advertising medium so large and complete that it will not be necessary for an advertiser to use the columns of any other county newspaper, except for supplementary advertising.

But the advertisers are not the only beneficiaries of the consolidation. The improvement in mechanical equipment made possible by the change will enable us to publish more news in more attractive form. Since the Journal's circulation has been at the 1500 mark it has often been difficult with our press facilities to get out the paper on time.

On the other hand, the editor of this paper, freed from the burdens of a job business can devote more time and energy to the newspaper.
B. B. Green, the retiring editor of the Argus, has made many friends during his editorial management of the Argus. He has always said what he thought without fear or favor, and the independence and moral tone of his utterances have inspired the confidence of his readers. It is gratifying to us to enter into so close a business association with Mr. Green and it is with pleasure that we commend the job patronage of the Journal to a man of such excellent character and ability.

Mr. Green is an expert designer, and associated as he is with a man who has had years of experience in book supply business, and with his time free to devote all his energies to his specialty, he will make the Columbus Printing and Specialty House one of the strongest job printing plants in the state, equipped to bring money to Columbus from all parts of the state as well as to handle all local job business.

In closing this announcement we desire especially to urge the business men of Platte County to give to Mr. Green the patronage his large and complete printing plant and his superior qualifications merit. For the Journal we have asked no pledges of support from the business men as a condition to the consolidation which primarily serves their interests, and now that the consolidation has been effected, we ask only that support dictated by their own self-interest and we shall expect the Journal to grow and prosper only in proportion as it helps Platte County and Platte County interests to grow and prosper.

The Journal plant will be moved on January 1st, to the old Columbus State Bank building on Twelfth St., under the same roof with the Columbus Printing and Specialty House, leaving the building on Eleventh St. which has housed the Journal since the early seventies.

We pause long enough to remark that the New Year is almost here and that "tainted hundred" is still unpaid.

It is to be hoped that the president's "big stick" will not stop swinging until it makes enough sore heads in Nebraska to demand homebased legislation for western Nebraska in harmony with the great cattle industry of that section of the state.

The appointment of Chairman W. P. Warner to succeed T. L. Mathews as Deputy United States Marshal will meet with general favor in Nebraska notwithstanding a majority of the people feel that Mr. Mathews was a victim of circumstances and that the "big stick" broke the wrong head. Mr. Warner is a man of force and ability and his feet are plenty large for the Mathews shoes.

Return of...
Sherlock Holmes

"It's this way, Mr. Holmes. As I have said, I am the skipper of the Rugged team of Cambridge varsity, and Godfrey Staunton is my best man. Tomorrow we play Oxford. Yesterday we all came up, and we settled at Bentley's private hotel. At 10 o'clock I went round and saw that all the fellows had gone to bed. I believe I believe in strict training and plenty of sleep to keep a team fit. I had a word or two with Godfrey before he turned in. He seemed to me to be pale and bothered. I asked him what was the matter. He said he was all right—just a touch of headache. I bade him good night and left him. Half an hour later, the porter tells me, a rough looking man with a beard called with a note for Godfrey. He had not gone to bed, and the note was taken to his room. Godfrey read it and fell back in a chair as if he had been pole axed. The porter was so scared that he was going to fetch me, but Godfrey stopped him, had a drink of water and pulled himself together. Then he went downstairs, said a few words to the man who was waiting in the hall, and the two of them went off together. The last that the porter saw of them was almost running down the street in the direction of the Strand. This morning Godfrey's room was empty, his bed had never been slept in, and his things were all just as I had seen them the night before. He had gone off at a moment's notice with this stranger, and no word has come from him since. I don't believe he will ever come back. He was a sportsman, was Godfrey, down to his marrow, and he wouldn't have stopped his training and let in his skipper if it were not for some cause that was too strong for him. No; I feel as if he were gone for good, and we should never see him again."

Sherlock Holmes listened with the deepest attention to this singular narrative.
"What did you do?" he asked.
"I tried to Cambridge to learn if anything had been heard of him there. I have had an answer. No one has seen him."
"Could he have got back to Cambridge?"
"Yes; there is a late train—quarter past 11."
"But, so far as you can ascertain, he did not take it?"
"No; he has not been seen."
"What did you do next?"
"I wired to Lord Mount-James."
"Why to Lord Mount-James?"
"Godfrey is an orphan, and Lord Mount-James is his nearest relative—his uncle, I believe."
"Indeed. This throws new light upon the matter. Lord Mount-James is one of the richest men in England."

"So you've heard Godfrey say,"
"And your friend was closely related?"
"Yes; he was his heir, and the old boy is nearly eighty—crank full of good humor. They say he could chalk his billiard cue with his knuckles. He never allowed Godfrey a shilling in his life, for he is an absolute miser, but it will all come to him right enough."
"Have you heard from Lord Mount-James?"
"No."
"What motive could your friend have in going to Lord Mount-James?"
"Well, something was worrying him the night before, and if it was to do with money it is possible that he would make for his nearest relative, who had so much of it, though from all I have heard he would not have much chance of getting it. Godfrey was not fond of the old man. He would not go if he could help it."

"Well, we can soon determine that. If your friend was going to his relative, Lord Mount-James, you have then to explain the visit of this rough looking fellow at a late hour and the agitation that was caused by his coming."
Cyril Overton pressed his hands to his head. "I can make nothing of it," said he.
"Well, well, I have a clear day, and I shall be happy to look into the matter," said Holmes. "I should strongly recommend you to make your preparations for your match without reference to this young gentleman. It must, as you say, have been an overpowering necessity which tore him away in such a fashion, and the same necessity is likely to hold him away. Let us step round together to the hotel and see if the porter can throw any fresh light upon the matter."

Sherlock Holmes was a past master in the art of putting a humble witness at his ease, and very soon, in the privacy of Godfrey Staunton's abandoned room, he had extracted all that the porter had to tell. The visitor of the night before was not a gentleman, neither was he a workman. He was simply what the porter described as a "mediocre looking chap," a man of fifty, beard grizzled, pale face, quietly dressed. He seemed himself to be agitated. The porter had observed his hand trembling when he had held out the note. Godfrey Staunton had crammed the note into his pocket. Staunton had not shaken hands with the man in the hall. They had exchanged a few sentences, of which the porter had only distinguished the one word "time." Then they had hurried off in the manner described. It was just half-past 10 by the hall clock.

"Let me see," said Holmes, sending himself on Staunton's bed. "You are the day porter, are you not?"
"Yes, sir. I go off duty at 11."
"The night porter saw nothing, I suppose?"
"No, sir. One theater party came in late; no one else."
"Were you on duty all day yesterday?"
"Yes, sir."
"Did you take any messages to Mr. Staunton?"
"Yes, sir; one telegram."
"Ah, that's interesting. What o'clock was this?"
"About 6."
"Where was Mr. Staunton when he received it?"
"Here in his room."
"Were you present when he opened it?"
"Yes, sir; I wanted to see if there was an answer."
"Well, was there?"
"Yes, sir; he wrote an answer."
"Did you take it?"
"No; he took it himself."
"But he wrote it in your presence?"
"Yes, sir. I was standing by the door and he with his back turned at that table. When he had written it he said, 'All right, porter, I will take this myself.'"
"What did he write it with?"
"A pen, sir."
"Was the telegraphic form one of these on the table?"
"Yes, sir; it was the top one."
Holmes rose. Taking the forms, he carried them over to the window and carefully examined that which was uppermost.

"It is a pity he did not write in pencil," said he, throwing them down again, with a shrug of disappointment. "As you have no doubt frequently observed, Watson, the impression usually goes through a fact which has disclosed many a happy marriage. However, I can find no trace here. I rejoice, however, to perceive that he wrote with a brand pointed quill pen, and I can hardly doubt that we will find some impression upon this blotting pad. Ah, yes, surely this is the very thing!"

He tore off a strip of the blotting paper and turned toward us the following hieroglyphic:

Cyril Overton was much excited. "Look it to the glass," he cried.
"That is unnecessary," said Holmes. "The paper is thin, and the reverse will give the message. Here it is." He turned it over and we read:

Stand by us for Grove Sake

"So that is the tail end of the telegram which Godfrey Staunton dispatched within a few hours of his disappearance. There are at least six words of the message which have escaped us, but what remains—'Stand by us for God's sake'—proves that this young man saw a formidable danger which approached him, and from which some one else could protect him. 'Us' mark you! Another person was involved. Who should it be but the pale faced, bearded man, who seemed himself in so nervous a state? What, then, is the connection between Godfrey Staunton and the bearded man? And what is the third source from which each of them sought for help against pressing danger? Our inquiry has already narrowed down to that."

"We have only to find to whom that telegram is addressed," I suggested.
"Exactly, my dear Watson. Your revelation though profound, had already crossed my mind. But I dare say it may have come to your notice that if you walk into a postoffice and demand to see the counterfoils of another man's message there may be some disinclination on the part of the officials to oblige you. There is so much red tape in these matters. However, I have no doubt that with a little delicacy and fluency the end may be attained. Meanwhile, I should like in your presence, Mr. Overton, to go through these papers which have been left upon the table."

There were a number of letters, bills and notebooks, which Holmes turned over and examined with quick, nervous fingers and darting, penetrating eyes. "Nothing here," he said at last. "By the way, I suppose your friend was a healthy young fellow—nothing amiss with him?"
"Sound as a bell."
"Have you ever known him ill?"
"Not a day. He has been laid up with a hack, and once he slipped his kneecap, but that was nothing."
"Perhaps he was not so strong as you suppose. I should think he may have had some secret trouble. With your assent, I will put one or two of these papers in my pocket, in case they should bear upon our future inquiry."

"One moment—one moment!" cried a querulous voice, and we looked up to find a queer little old man jerking and twitching in the doorway. He was dressed in rusty black, with a very broad brimmed top hat and a loose white necktie—the whole effect being that of a very rustic person or of an undertaker's mate. Yet, in spite of his shabby and even absurd appearance, his voice had a sharp crackle and his manner a quick intensity which commanded attention.

"Who are you, sir, and by what right do you touch this gentleman's papers?" he asked.
"I am a private detective, and I am endeavoring to explain his disappearance."
"Oh, you are, are you? And who instructed you, eh?"
"This gentleman, Mr. Staunton's friend, was referred to me by Scotland Yard."
"Who are you, sir?"
"I am Cyril Overton."
"Then it is you who sent me a telegram. My name is Lord Mount-James. I came round as quickly as the Bayswater bus would bring me. So you have instructed a detective?"
"Yes, sir."
"And are you prepared to meet the cost?"
"I have no doubt, sir, that my friend Godfrey, when we find him, will be prepared to do that."
"But if he is never found, eh? Answer me that!"
"In that case no doubt his family—"

"Nothing of the sort, sir!" screamed the little man. "Don't look to me for a penny—not a penny! You understand that, Mr. Detective! I am all the family that this young man has got, and I tell you that I am not responsible. If he has any expectations it is due to the fact that I have never wasted money, and I do not propose to begin to do so now. As to those papers with which you are making so free, I may tell you that in case there should be anything of any value among them you will be held strictly to account for what you do with them."

"Very good, sir," said Sherlock Holmes. "May I ask in the meanwhile whether you have yourself any theory to account for this young man's disappearance?"
"No, sir, I have not. He is big enough and old enough to look after himself, and if he is so foolish as to lose himself I entirely refuse to accept the responsibility of hunting for him."
"I quite understand your position," said Holmes, with a mischievous twinkle in his eyes. "Perhaps you don't quite understand mine. Godfrey Staunton appears to have been a poor man. If he has been kidnaped it could not have been for anything which he himself possesses. The fame of your wealth has gone abroad, Lord Mount-James, and it is certainly possible that a gang of thieves have secured your nephew in order to gain from him some information as to your house, your habits and your treasure."

The face of our unpleasant little visitor turned as white as his necktie. "Heaven's sake, what an idea! I never thought of such villainy! What villain! roars there are in the world! But Godfrey is a fine lad—a staunch lad. Nothing would induce him to give his old uncle away. I'll have the plate moved over to the bank this evening. In the meantime spare no pains, Mr. Detective! I beg you to leave no stone unturned to bring him safely back. As to money, well, so far as a five or even a tenner goes, you can always look to me."

Even in his chastened frame of mind the noble miser could give us no information which could help us, for he knew little of the private life of his nephew. Our only clue lay in the trunk which he had taken, and with a copy of this in his hand Holmes set forth to find a second link for his chain. We had shaken off Lord Mount-James, and Overton had gone to consult with the other members of his team over the misfortune which had befallen them.

There was a telegraph office at a short distance from the hotel. We halted outside it.
"It's worth trying, Watson," said Holmes. "Of course with a warrant we could demand to see the counterfoils, but we have not reached that stage yet. I don't suppose they remember faces in so busy a place. Let us venture it."

"I am sorry to trouble you," said he in his bluntest manner to the young woman behind the grating; "there is some small mistake about a telegram I sent yesterday. I have had no answer, and I very much fear that I must have omitted to put my name at the end. Could you tell me if this was so?"
The young woman turned over a sheaf of counterfoils.
"What o'clock was it?" she asked.
"A little after 6."
Holmes put his finger to his lips and glanced at me. "The last words in it were 'for God's sake,'" he whispered confidentially. "I am very anxious at getting no answer."
The young woman separated one of the forms.
"This is it. There is no name," said she, smoothing it out upon the counter. "Then that, of course, accounts for my getting no answer," said Holmes.

"Dear me, how very stupid of me, to be sure! Good morning, miss, and many thanks for having relieved my mind." He chuckled and rubbed his hands when we found ourselves in the street once more.
"Well? I asked.
"We progress, my dear Watson, we progress. I had seven different schemes for getting a glimpse of that telegram, but I could hardly hope to succeed the very first time."
"And what have you gained?"
"A starting point for our investigation." He hailed a cab. "King's Cross station," said he.
"We have a journey, then?"
"Yes, I think we must run down to Cambridge together. All the indications seem to me to point in that direction."
"Tell me," I asked, as we rattled up Gray's Inn road, "have you any suspicion yet as to the cause of the disappearance? I don't think that among all our cases I have known one where the motives are more obscure. Surely you don't really imagine that he may be kidnaped in order to give information against his wealthy uncle?"
"I confess, my dear Watson, that that does not appeal to me as a very probable explanation. It struck me, however, as being the one which was most likely to interest that exceedingly unpleasant old person."

"It certainly did that, but what are your alternatives?"
"I could mention several. You must admit that it is curious and suggestive that this incident should occur on the eve of this important match and should involve the only man whose presence seems essential to the success of the side. It may, of course, be a coincidence, but it is interesting. Amateur sport is free from betting, but a good deal of outside betting goes on among the public, and it is possible that it might be worth some one's while to get at a player as the ruffians of the turf get at a race horse. There is one explanation. A second very obvious one is that this young man really is the heir of a great property, however modest his means may at present be, and it is not impossible that a plot to hold him for ransom might be concocted."

"These theories take no account of the telegram."
"Quite true, Watson. The telegram still remains the only solid thing with which we have to deal, and we must not permit our attention to wander away from it. It is to gain light upon the purpose of this telegram that we are now upon our way to Cambridge. The path of our investigation is at present obscure, but I shall be very much surprised if before evening we had not cleared it up or made a considerable advance along it."

It was already dark when we reached the old university city. Holmes took a cab at the station and ordered the man to drive to the house of Dr. Leslie Armstrong. A few minutes later we had stopped at a large mansion in the busiest thoroughfare. We were shown in and after a long wait were at last admitted into the consulting room, where we found the doctor seated behind his table.

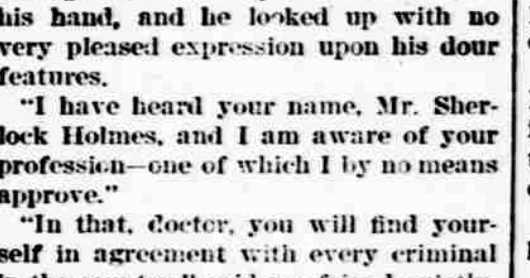

It argues the degree in which I had lost touch with my profession that the name of Leslie Armstrong was unknown to me. Now I am aware that he is not only one of the heads of the medical school of the university, but a thinker of European reputation in more than one branch of science. Yet even without knowing his brilliant record one could not fail to be impressed by a mere glance at the man—the square, massive face, the brooding eyes under the thatched brows and the granite molding of the inflexible jaw, a man of deep character, a man with an alert mind, grim, ascetic, self-contained, formidable—so I read Dr. Leslie Armstrong. He held my friend's ear in his hand, and he looked up with no very pleased expression upon his dour features.

"I have heard your name, Mr. Sherlock Holmes, and I am aware of your profession—one of which I by no means approve."
"In that, doctor, you will find yourself in agreement with every criminal in the country," said my friend quietly.
"So far as your efforts are directed toward the suppression of crime, sir, they must have the support of every reasonable member of the community, though I cannot doubt that the official machinery is amply sufficient for the purpose. Where your calling is more open to criticism is when you pry into the secrets of private individuals, when you rake up family matters which are of expression in the rugged features of the doctor.

"He left his hotel last night—he has not been heard of."
"No doubt he will return."
"Tomorrow is the varsity football match."
"I have no sympathy with these childish games. The young man's fate interests me deeply, since I know him and like him. The football match does not come within my horizon at all."
"I claim your sympathy, then, in my investigation of Mr. Staunton's fate. Do you know where he is?"
"Certainly not."
"You have not seen him since yesterday?"
"No, I have not."
"Was Mr. Staunton a healthy man?"
"Absolutely."
"Did you ever know him ill?"
Holmes popped a sheet of paper before the doctor's eyes. "Then perhaps you will explain this receipted bill for 15 guineas paid by Mr. Godfrey Staunton last month to Dr. Leslie Armstrong of Cambridge. I picked it out from among the papers upon his desk."
The doctor flushed with anger.
"I do not feel that there is any reason why I should render an explanation to you, Mr. Holmes."
Holmes replaced the bill in his notebook. "If you prefer a public explanation, it must come sooner or later," said he. "I have already told you that I can hush up that which others will be bound to publish, and which would really be wiser to take me into your complete confidence."
"I know nothing about it."
"Did you hear from Mr. Staunton in London?"
"Certainly not."
"Dear me, dear me—the postoffice again!" Holmes sighed wearily. "A most urgent telegram was dispatched to you from London by Godfrey Staunton at 6:15 yesterday evening—a telegram which is undoubtedly associated with his disappearance—and yet you have not had it. It is most culpable. I shall certainly go down to the office here and register a complaint."
Dr. Leslie Armstrong sprang up from behind his desk, and his dark face was crimson with fury.
"I'll trouble you to walk out of my house, sir," said he. "You can tell your employer, Lord Mount-James, that I do not wish to have anything to do either with him or with his agents. No, sir—not another word!" He rang the bell furiously. "John, show these gentlemen out." A pompous butler whistled us severely to the door, and we found ourselves in the street. Holmes burst out laughing.
"Dr. Leslie Armstrong is certainly a man of energy and character," said he. "I have not seen a man who, if he turns his talents that way, was more calculated to fill the gap left by the illustrious Moriarty. And now, my poor Watson, here we are, stranded and friendless in this inhospitable town, which we cannot leave without abandoning our case. This little lun just opposite Armstrong's house is singularly adapted to our needs. If you would engage a front room and purchase the necessities for the night, I may have time to make a few inquiries."
These few inquiries proved, however, to be a more lengthy proceeding than Holmes had imagined, for he did not return to the inn until nearly 9 o'clock. He was pale and dejected, stained with dust, and exhausted with hunger and fatigue. A cold supper was ready upon the table, and when his needs were satisfied and his pipe alight he was ready to take that half comic and wholly philosophic view which was natural to him when his affairs were going awry. The sound of carriage wheels caused him to rise and glance out of the window. A brougham and pair of grays stood before the doctor's door.

"It's been out three hours," said Holmes. "Started at 6:30, and here it is back again. That gives a radius of ten or twelve miles, and he does it once or sometimes twice a day."
"No unusual thing for a doctor in practice."
"But Armstrong is not really a doctor in practice. He is a lecturer and a consultant, but he does not care for general practice, which distracts him from his literary work. Why, then, does he make these long journeys, which must be exceedingly irksome to him, and who is it that he visits?"
"His coachman."
"My dear Watson, can you doubt that it was to him that I first applied? I do not know whether it came from his own innate depravity or from the promptings of his master, but he was rude enough to set a dog at me. Neither dog nor man liked the look of my stick, however, and the matter fell through. All that I have learned I got from a friendly native in the yard of our own inn. It was he who told me of the doctor's habits and of his daily journey. At that instant, to give point to his words, the carriage came round to the door."
"Could you not follow it?"
(To be continued.)

CATARRH

Copyright by Collier's Weekly.
Dr. Leslie Armstrong.
better hidden, and when you incidentally waste the time of men who are more busy than yourself. At the present moment, for example, I should be writing a treatise instead of conversing with you."
"No doubt, doctor, and yet the conversation may prove more important than the treatise. Incidentally I may tell you that we are doing the reverse of what you very justly blame, and that we are endeavoring to prevent anything like public exposure of private matters which must necessarily follow when once the case is fairly in the hands of the official police. You may look upon me simply as an irregular pioneer, who goes in front of the regular forces of the country. I have come to ask you about Mr. Godfrey Staunton."
"What about him?"
"You know him, do you not?"
"He is an intimate friend of mine."
"You are aware that he has disappeared?"
"Ah, indeed! There was no chance of expression in the rugged features of the doctor.

"He left his hotel last night—he has not been heard of."
"No doubt he will return."
"Tomorrow is the varsity football match."
"I have no sympathy with these childish games. The young man's fate interests me deeply, since I know him and like him. The football match does not come within my horizon at all."
"I claim your sympathy, then, in my investigation of Mr. Staunton's fate. Do you know where he is?"
"Certainly not."
"You have not seen him since yesterday?"
"No, I have not."
"Was Mr. Staunton a healthy man?"
"Absolutely."
"Did you ever know him ill?"
Holmes popped a sheet of paper before the doctor's eyes. "Then perhaps you will explain this receipted bill for 15 guineas paid by Mr. Godfrey Staunton last month to Dr. Leslie Armstrong of Cambridge. I picked it out from among the papers upon his desk."
The doctor flushed with anger.
"I do not feel that there is any reason why I should render an explanation to you, Mr. Holmes."
Holmes replaced the bill in his notebook. "If you prefer a public explanation, it must come sooner or later," said he. "I have already told you that I can hush up that which others will be bound to publish, and which would really be wiser to take me into your complete confidence."
"I know nothing about it."
"Did you hear from Mr. Staunton in London?"
"Certainly not."
"Dear me, dear me—the postoffice again!" Holmes sighed wearily. "A most urgent telegram was dispatched to you from London by Godfrey Staunton at 6:15 yesterday evening—a telegram which is undoubtedly associated with his disappearance—and yet you have not had it. It is most culpable. I shall certainly go down to the office here and register a complaint."
Dr. Leslie Armstrong sprang up from behind his desk, and his dark face was crimson with fury.
"I'll trouble you to walk out of my house, sir," said he. "You can tell your employer, Lord Mount-James, that I do not wish to have anything to do either with him or with his agents. No, sir—not another word!" He rang the bell furiously. "John, show these gentlemen out." A pompous butler whistled us severely to the door, and we found ourselves in the street. Holmes burst out laughing.
"Dr. Leslie Armstrong is certainly a man of energy and character," said he. "I have not seen a man who, if he turns his talents that way, was more calculated to fill the gap left by the illustrious Moriarty. And now, my poor Watson, here we are, stranded and friendless in this inhospitable town, which we cannot leave without abandoning our case. This little lun just opposite Armstrong's house is singularly adapted to our needs. If you would engage a front room and purchase the necessities for the night, I may have time to make a few inquiries."
These few inquiries proved, however, to be a more lengthy proceeding than Holmes had imagined, for he did not return to the inn until nearly 9 o'clock. He was pale and dejected, stained with dust, and exhausted with hunger and fatigue. A cold supper was ready upon the table, and when his needs were satisfied and his pipe alight he was ready to take that half comic and wholly philosophic view which was natural to him when his affairs were going awry. The sound of carriage wheels caused him to rise and glance out of the window. A brougham and pair of grays stood before the doctor's door.

"It's been out three hours," said Holmes. "Started at 6:30, and here it is back again. That gives a radius of ten or twelve miles, and he does it once or sometimes twice a day."
"No unusual thing for a doctor in practice."
"But Armstrong is not really a doctor in practice. He is a lecturer and a consultant, but he does not care for general practice, which distracts him from his literary work. Why, then, does he make these long journeys, which must be exceedingly irksome to him, and who is it that he visits?"
"His coachman."
"My dear Watson, can you doubt that it was to him that I first applied? I do not know whether it came from his own innate depravity or from the promptings of his master, but he was rude enough to set a dog at me. Neither dog nor man liked the look of my stick, however, and the matter fell through. All that I have learned I got from a friendly native in the yard of our own inn. It was he who told me of the doctor's habits and of his daily journey. At that instant, to give point to his words, the carriage came round to the door."
"Could you not follow it?"
(To be continued.)

JIM'S PLACE
I carry the best of everything in my line. The drinking public is invited to come in and see for themselves.
JAS. NEVELA, Proprietor
516 Twelfth Street Phone No. 115

C. N. McELFRESH
Attorney - at - Law
Zinnecker B'ldg, Columbus, Nebr.

Wm. DIETRIGHS
House, Sign and Carriage
Painting
Lawn and Ornamental Painting of all kinds. City or Country.
Tel. 212. COLUMBUS, NEB.

R. W. HOBART
Attorney - at - Law
Rooms 10 and 11 New Columbus State Bank Building.

A. M. POST
Attorney : at : Law
Columbus, Neb.

Brick House Herd Durocs
100 March and early April pigs for Summer and Fall trade. Can furnish in pairs or trios, not related, at bargain prices. Write or call for prices or description.
RFD 4, Columbus. J. J. BARNES

DONT WASTE GRAIN!
A Cheaply Made Wagon
Will Waste Enough
Grain to Buy a Good One.
Our wagons will not scatter your grain while on the road to market or overtax your horses with needless heavy draught.

We keep only the Latest and BEST in Buggies and Carriages
—All Kinds—
FARM IMPLEMENTS.
Our horse shoes stick and don't lame your horses
TRY THEM.

LOUIS SCHREIBER.

G. J. GARLOW
— Lawyer —
Office over Columbus State Bank Columbus, Neb.

J. D. STILES,
ATTORNEY AT LAW.
Office, Olive St., fourth door north of First National Bank.
COLUMBUS, NEBRASKA

J. H. GALLEY
Dealer in
Dry Goods, Clothing,
Hats, Caps, Cloaks and
Carpets
Columbus, Nebraska

HE can play on his knees,
He can climb all the trees,
And holes in his stockings
Will never be seen;
He can hop, skip and jump,
He can shin up a stump,
If he wears Improved
"Ira's Clads No. 19."
For Sale By
J. H. GALLEY
Dealer in
Dry Goods, Clothing,
Hats, Caps, Cloaks and
Carpets
Columbus, Nebraska

ELYS CREAM BALM
This Remedy is a Specific,
Sure to Give Satisfaction.
GIVES RELIEF AT ONCE.
It cleanses, soothes, heals, and protects the diseased membrane. It cures Catarrh and drives away a Cold in the Head quickly. Restores the Senses of Taste and Smell. Easy to use. Contains no injurious drugs. Applied into the nostrils and absorbed. Large Size, 50 cents at Druggets or by mail; Trial Size, 10 cents by mail.
ELY BROTHERS, 56 Worth St., New York.