service, which meant added power for Pinchot, the chief started the militant field work that finally got him into difficulties with his superiors. He worked with but one object in viewthe placing of forests in America on the same high plane they have reached, after years of painstaking care, in Germany. Results were what he wanted and he didn't care how he got them. He was backed by President Roosevelt in his efforts to put the forests of the nation under rigid governmental control and he became a member of that strenuous executive's "tennis cabinet." At the end of the Roosevelt administration Pinchot was at the head of an army of 1.400 men commanding a yearly appropriation of $3,100,000, and while nominally in a subordinate position he exerted more influence in his own special field than did the secretary of the interior

Pinchot had been a lover of the trees from childhood and in 1889, after his graduation from Yale, had gone to Europe to acquire the best possible information in regard to forests and their preservation. He attended the Ecole Nationale Forestiere at Nancy, France, and then took up field work in the French Alps. After further study in Switzerland, Germany and Austria he returned to the United States and spent a year in travel in the western states and Canada. In Vanderbilt forestry experiment at Biltmore, N. taling 21,000,000 acres, were created. Mr. Ballinger, when he became secretary of the interior, gave Mr. Pinchot to understand that he (Ballinger) was boss. They differed materially over methods of procedure in western forest and Alaska coal land cases, with the results that finally culminated in Mr. Pinchot's open defiance of President Taft's orders-in writing a letter to Senator Dolliver to be read in the senate-and his dismisa conference of cabinet ministers had decided that he was an incorrigible
