have often seen. Some of the greatest painters have done their best in this fashion, always or at times.

The main thing is not how a painter works but what result he achieves. If the result is truthful and alive, if it portrays or suggests something that he really saw, then his method is good. Your part, as an intelligent observer who wants to enjoy and to learn, is to try to discover what he saw, why he cared to paint it, what he wished his picture to convey to you, and whether he speaks his meaning clearly. And it is surprising how quickly, looking at good pictures in this mood, even the inexperienced may learn something about real pictorial excellence- how soon they will understand that such excellence can be enjoyed even though it does not coincide with strong personal preferences, and how delighted they will be by this enlargement of the power to receive from varied works of art varied kinds of pleasure of the eye and pleasure of the mind.
