Many people, who are not familiar with student life, misjudge the student and question the moral character of the University. This error is due in part to the fact that the student's environments are peculiar, and he becomes independent and loses some of his timidity. But, as far as his purpose is concerned, there is little question. It is as noble and upright as could well be. His independence, which is the result of having to force his way through an institution by individual effort, is too often mistaken for arrogance, insolence and downright meanness. The student, therefore, in traveling from place to place should keep in mind that he leaves an impression and it should be such as to correct a common error.

By so doing he would be discharging a part of the obligation which he owes to the institution that he attends.

Now that the ground is covered with snow and students are required by force of circumstances to use side walks exclusively, it might be appropriate to mention an evil which has already received more or less notice in these columns. We refer to the custom of cutting across lots on the way to and from classes and drill. This custom which has been growing of late is threatening to ruin the beauty of the campus. The grass plots are marked with paths which already are prominent enough to mar their beauty.

This is an evil that public opinion ought to kill. There should be in the University such a strong sentiment against it that it would die of its own accord. Students should take an individual pride in the appearance of the grounds and should strive to keep them always in the best possible shape.

Within two weeks the preliminary debates for the choosing of contestants to represent the University in the interstate contests will be held. The preliminary contests ought to receive the cordial support of the student body. The prospects for a winning team this year are certainly bright. Never before have the debates been put on such thoroughly intellectual grounds. Never before have they been managed in so business like a way. The new system of having a special class for those who are likely to make the teams will insure the development of all the talent there is in the men. This much has been done by those who are directing affairs. But they cannot do it all. A large part of the responsibility for the success of the debates lies with the students themselves. Without student support the debating Board can do little. Effort is being made to have a large and enthusiastic audience present at the preliminaries. This should meet the approval and assistance of the students and they should do all that they are able to do by turning out and making the meeting a rousing success.
