The university senate, which was to have met yesterday to decide in regard to the cadet camp this spring, was not called together, and as a result the desired information will not be generally known until a later date.

The prevalence of crime and its prevention was the theme of an address at convocation yesterday morning by Chief Hoagland of the Lincoln police department. Chief Hoagland is an old army comrad of Chancellor Andrews.

At the beginning of his speech the chief said he was not an experienced public speaker and felt greater embarrassment in standing before the crowd than he would standing before a mob. In view of some past experiences of the chief and the students, this remark brought out considerable laughter on the part of the audience.

Chief Hoagland said that the study of crime and criminals is an important one and deserves careful study. He asserted that it presents a problem that must be solved or crime will overrun the land. Students, he said, are the proper ones to study it.

As a cause of crime the chief does not regard intemperance as important a factor as many think it is. While he declared it to be the greatest of all evils, it does not produce near all the crime. Bad home influence, he declared, are the causes of more crime than saloons. The real criminals do not generally blunt their mental faculty with whisky. Evil associations attendant upon the drink habit had a potent influence, but the home is the root of the evil. These, he said, should be reformed. Criminal instincts inherited from ancestors will crop out and if something is not done to cultivate a better nature the child will very likely grow up a criminal. This class seldom reform. Another class, he said, are criminals by accident or environment. They include those who yield to a sudden temptation.

"Statistics," said the chief, "show that crime is increasing." These statistics cannot be taken as final because facilities for apprehending criminals have grown so much better that a large percentage of criminals are caught than formerly. The use of the telegraph, telephone and the bureau of identification and a more general co-operation of officers has made arrest almost certain.

The general influence of education, he thought, was to lessen crime, especially in the lower forms. About one-fourth of the prison population have a high school or academic education. Educated persons usually confine themselves to fraud or some class of crime that requires ingenuity.

The real cause of crime in many cases, he asserted, is not desire for gain, but an inherent tendency to crime. He would send professional criminals to the penitentiary for life.

In closing, Chief Hoagland declared that the number of arrests among students in Lincoln is less than in any other college town from which he receives reports.
