Editorial Remarks

Today the University opens its doors in welcome to the visiting high school students. The preparations for their entertainment have been carefully planned and are of such a character as to make the occasion a memorable one to the young students. Besides the considerations of pleasure and enjoyment, there are other features in connection with this event that are of great importance. An opportunity will be given to these students to visit the many departments of the University and to acquire adequate ideas as to the magnitude of this institution. Many of them will in the future come here to pursue courses of study, and against that time such knowledge of the University as they may acquire upon this occasion will be of the greatest usefulness to them. Such being the case, no more pleasant and profitable mode of entertainment could be devised for them than that included in today's program. Some may become so impressed with the advantages offered by a University course, that they may become desirous of entering one, although they had not previously considered the matter at all. At all events it is our duty to show a true spirit of hospitality to our guests, and every student should lend his services to making their visit a pleasant and profitable one.

Today's symposium upon the "annual question" is inspired by no hostility to the particular individuals concerned in their publication, but solely by the almost innumerable complaints which have reached us in regard to the methods employed in their publication of the volumes. One of the most-criticized actions of the present management of the Sombro, however, is not mentioned in the symposium. We refer to the plea, made before both class and regents, that the management was "going in the hole" several hundred dollars, and the obtaining of extra help and patronage on this basis. Responses to the plea was hardly made before one of the managers was overheard remarking to a friend that it was expected $400 or $500 would be cleared on the book. Many who had no objection to the management "making something" on the book, objected very seriously to this obtaining of patronage "under false pretenses." The thorough airing of this subject, in as fair a way as our today's symposium does it, will harm no one who is guiltless of guile, and may succeed in pointing out an available means of reform. In that hope it is given to the University public.

Contributors to our columns are warned that there is no longer any "Nebraskan box" in the hallway of the main building. Since the office is open all hours of the day or night, a mere push on the door being all that is necessary to gain admission, we have dispensed with any box for news items. Stick them on the copy hook on the desk, and they will reach the editor. This notice is called forth by the fact that Professor Barber has rescued several items for us from the depths of his composition box near the door of U. 204.

Convocation Notes

Yesterday's Exercises:

The convocation period yesterday morning was taken up in considering the proposed Rockefeller gift. Mr. Tellen, president of the senior class, first spoke, and then introduced Miss Van Zandt, president of the juniors, who spoke in favor of the students of each class contributing toward the fund. Mr. Beers, president of the sophomore class, said that his class was anxious to do its share, and Mr. Waldron, president of the freshmen, thought that at least $400 could be raised by his class.

After the four class presidents had used the time to which they were limited, Chancellor Andrews spoke. He said that there was some opposition to the acceptance of this gift from Mr. Rockefeller because of his connection with the trusts, but as far as he knew, neither the Standard Oil trust or any other trust had made this offer. Mr. Rockefeller's money was not to any great extent drawn from the Standard Oil trust, but more from great banking institutions and other financial enterprises. He is a man who rose from the ranks of the common people, and if any guilt attached to the methods by which he made his fortune, as much attached to the newspapers of the country which have poured undeserved showers of vituperation upon Mr. Rockefeller's head.

The building is needed. The present quarters of the Christian associations is shameful. The present accommodations are not adequate to meet the social needs of these organizations. Besides these, the needs of the literary societies, of the Phi Beta Kappa, and other University organizations, cannot be overlooked.

Some say that this state is able to build all necessary buildings. But is it just to impose upon the generosity of the people of the state thus far? The University, because of this generosity, together with the business methods of the University officers, has outgrown the resources of the state. It is impossible for the state to build as fast as the growth of the University demands. Besides, it is a question whether the state could be legally taxed for a building to be used for such purposes.

Many new buildings are needed. One is needed at the farm. A physics building is needed and likewise a new administration building. Besides these, we need a new astronomical observatory, a dormitory for the women of first year classes, and, finally, a grand new building worth two or three hundred thousand dollars should supplant the old University hall. These are all pressing—almost crying—needs.

One of the most hopeful results of this gift may be that people of wealth outside will be stimulated to help the cause. Our full possibilities cannot be reached unless we get this help, and the chancellor urged that we be as liberal as we are able in making our contributions.

Is Reform Needed in Class Books?

of a large sum of money, rather than the publication of an annual of which the University might be proud. Certain it is that the sort of annuals issued, combined with the conduct of the management, and seasoned by what purports to be information from the inside, has afforded reasonable ground for the prevailing sentiment. The question is, What is the remedy? Heretofore it has been the custom to elect an editor-in-chief, whose remuneration consisted of the honor, and a business manager, whose recompense has often been twice that of a regular University instructor. The political wire-pulling for Sombro business manager has, in the instance of the last two annuals, been notoriously open, even as early as the freshman year. The trades and counter-trades, known only to the few who guide the class destiny, constitute a bewildering maze even to the active promoter. There is not a class but contains men fully capable of editing the Sombro, and who would gladly accept such positions solely for the honor attached. Heretofore the editor could not carry out his plans because of the business manager's desire to curtail expenses, and the editor had no means of ascertaining whether the finances would or would not bear the desired expense. This year the editor and business manager shared profits, but such a plan must be condemned upon the face of it. The business manager should be hired, as is the advertising solicitor of the

This Season's Lace Gloves and Lace Mitts

Some are in the daintiest spider-web mesh without much distinctness of pattern excepting long lines that make the hands look slim.

Some of plain silk have three narrow stripes of half open-work in a simple, hand-made effect.

One style looks like a piece of rare mesh lace.

Since there is likely to be a dearth of them later, on account of their great popularity,

Graduates and Summer Girls will do well to see them soon. The white and black are equally attractive.

Plain silk gloves, short or elbow length, pearl clasps, 50c to $1.50.

Plain lisle gloves, short, 25c to 75c.

Silk lace gloves, elbow length, $1.00 to $2.00.
