An Epic of the Strenuous To-Day

How Sir Bonnius, Now Deceased, Witnessed a Football Game

Sir Geoffry Bonnius
Was a knight of renown—
A chief among knights
In King Arthur's town,
A man unexcelled
In tournament fray
And ready to joust
Will all in his way

Strong indeed was his spear
And full heavy his shield.
With wonderful power
Both these did he wield.
So mighty was he
In arm, limb and hand,
His fame spread abroad
Throughout the whole land.

But he finally reached
The summit of fame,
And passing from life
Left naught but his name.
Out of its prison
Rising like leaven
His soul sped to the Kingdom of heaven.

There he lived many years
In the greatest of peace
Unmindful of earth,
And of time's increase.
As many new nations
Rise and decline
He noted them not,
In the passing of time.

Thus he passed many years
In great quiet and ease,
And sang without rest
'Neath tall laurel trees.
But there came a day
When he ceased from mirth:
A longing he had
To visit the earth.

For to enter again
With vim, fury and fire
A tournament grand
Was his chiefest desire.
At a time opportune—
The gate being ajar—
He sailed into space
And travelled afar.

And as he descended
To earth once again,
Clouds of dust he saw
On a faraway plain.
Right glad was this shade,
And much agitated;
And the ichor in
His veins circulated.

And swift down to that spot
He wended his way,
Eager to enter
The thick of the fray.
With a whoop of joy,
For a spirit loud,
He arrived unnoticed
Amid the great crowd.

Then he passed afrighted,
By wonder impelled—
Such a terrible sight
He'd never beheld.
Two thick ranks of foemen
Assailing each other,
The wildest furies
Did rashly uncover.

In the thick huddled mass,
In the carnage so drear,
Flashed not a shield,
On 'tip of spear.
No coats of mail
Did these strange knights wear,
But the strangest of garb
And wildest of hair.

Back and forth as they swayed
In fierceness of battle,
Their teeth—wield music—
Loudly did rattle.
With wildest of wrath
Each strove to crush
His foe to the earth,
With mad whirl and rush.

Then up from the press
A queer object sped,
Passing over a frame
Like an arch o'er the dead.
And up from the crowd
Ascended a roar
Like a tidal wave
On a rock-bound shore.

Then spake Sir Bonnius,
Overcome by great fright:
"What manner is this
To joust and to fight?"

Peradventure methinks
I've happened among
Some wild heathen race
Of barbarous tongue.

"Strange men are these knights,
Strange cries do I hear,
Strange colors I see;
My heart beats with fear.
Such a fiercely fought battle
I've never beheld,
Such fearful slaughter
By fury impelled.

Like a dude in a drug store
When treating his girl,
Digs down for his coin
With brain in mad whirl,
And he finds—sad mistake—
He's forgotten his purse
And hasn't the means
With which to disburse.

Just so Sir Bonnius
Did tremble and quake,
And his limbs unloosed
Like aspen leaves shake.
"It was wrongful of me,"
He soberly said,
"To revisit the earth
From the realms of the dead.

"I'll return now at once
And never again
Will I leave my abode
To mingle with men."
Then up like a rocket
On the 4th of July,

He mounted aloft
To the dome of the sky.

O Time, you're a monster,
Thou certainly art,
To work this disturbance
In this good knight's heart.
A lesson thou taught him—
That it is the best way
To say where he is Until Judgment Day.
