Solliloquy Of A Fountain Pen.

The heavy darkness of midnight lay over the little study. A slight rustling was heard in the low silver pen tray, and the mottled red and black fountain pen sighed. "Oh, I do feel so tired and empty," she said, "I tell you, I've had a day of it."

"Aw, what are you grumbling about? You don't know what it is to work till you've belonged to a boy, and a Junior," said the fat, black Waterman.

"Well, it isn't the amount of work I object to. You see, the gold pen here told me last night that Alice's mother wants her to have class honors, and I would run myself dry for that; what I object to is this everlasting changing, a note in a book, then on a scrap of paper, then something else. Just let me tell you what I had to go through with this afternoon, just for one hour."

"Alice sat down at a library table, opened her note book, her history book, and my work began."

"Northwest Territory—
Maryland demands cession of western lands before signing the articles of—"

"Then on a scrap she wrote to the girl next to her: 'Say, Bess, what do you think of the Sigma Nu's new pledge?'"

"The scrap came back, and I read: 'Don't like him. Where did they pick him up?'"

"Got him from the west. His father is a big Mogul somewhere out in that country. Tell me who is the handsome lad across from Archie—he with the classic face? * * * Why is he? * * * Well, I should say. * * * I'll have Ted introduce me immediately."

"Then back to the history: Articles of Confederation. Claimants—Va., largest; N. Y. next, then Mass. and Conn. Claims based on charters and"

"Just then a boy sat down on the other side and he scribbled: 'Going anywhere tomorrow night?'"

"Yes, girls' affair at the frat, house."

"May I come after you?'"

"No!"

"Why?'"

"Your know why."

"No, I don't."

"Well, then; because I say so. Now, do go away and leave me to study. I've got twenty pages to read."

"Back we went to the note book: Struggle over signing articles. Md. obstinate. Va. arranges to sell western lands."

"A small book comes slipping across the notes and someone says:

"Write some cue toast that you have heard.' So, wrote—"

"Here's to those that I love;

"Here's to those that love me."

"Here's to those that love those that I love,

"And to those that love those that love me."

"History notes again: 'N. Y. starts action by ceding claims to gov., and U. S. promises to use all lands gained for the benefit of all the states.'"

"Here a little note comes fluttering over which says: 'Alice, dear; what are you going to wear to the Non-Com. I actually haven't a respectable gown, except what I have worn at least three times.'"

"I scratch off the answer; 'Why, you always look sweet, so it doesn't matter what you wear. I have to wear by old blue crepe, but Oh, you should just see my slippers, patent and embroidered satin.'"

"Back to the note book: 'Md ratifies 1781.'"

"The gong sounds, and I'm shoved into her purse till class time. Do you wonder I am tired?" and the mottled pen sighed.

Senior Class Play.

Practice for the Senior class play is proceeding regularly. The rest of the parts that had remained vacant are now filled out. In order to provide funds for present needs the members of the class were asked the remit their assessment for the play now. A large sum has been remitted already.
