view. Where he proved very stubborn, however, the aid of people in his neighborhood was called into requisition. From the list of 2,500 graduates were selected those living near the doubter. They were requested to call on him and talk the matter over. The request was never disregarded, and in many cases graduates on farms managed along modern lines were able to make practical demonstrations that carried far more weight than mere words. Superintendents of the local schools were also enlisted on behalf of the university, and all reasonable pressure brought to bear. In by far the greater number of instances this follow-up work brought students.

The service is not expensive, and the direct results have more than justified the trouble taken with it. Furthermore, a good foundation has been laid for future results, for by spreading information about itself the university has come close to the people of Nebraska, led them to use its facilities for helping farmers as well as students, and established the university idea for a generation to come.
