SPLendid EULOGY

freshmen, the first class to follow him from beginning to end of its college course. I spoke just now of our privilege, but I am sure that every man among us felt far more keenly the responsibility. It is no easy task to secure upon canvas a fitting portrait of any great man, but to present a portrait of a man like this and to offer it to the criticism of thousands of men, each one of whom carries in his heart a memory by which this shall be tested, it was a task which might well bring upon us the sense of our responsibility.

"In grappling with the task, Mr. President, we have done our best. Only sixty-one men graduated with our class but sixty-five men have contributed to the portrait fund. The artist whom we have secured, William M. Chase, of New York, is ranked as one of the foremost portrait painters of the present day. To him our invitation came as an opportunity and he has entered upon it with boundless enthusiasm. No restrictions were placed upon him; he was asked only to give us his best, to give us a fitting representation of a man worthy of his highest endeavor.

"May I say a word, Mr. President, to express what we expect this portrait to mean to the university? It is to give to the boys who come up year after year to the old college a vision, a vision of Bennie Andrews, to speak to them of the days when we were here. It is an older man than we knew who looks out from the canvas there; when first you see it as I did your heart will rebel against the portrait, as did mine, for you will realize that this man is older by fifteen years of toil than was the Andrews who come to us in '89. But the boys will not know that. What they will see, even though they are blind to many of the things that made him dear to you and me, what no one could fail to see in Andrews—is a man. That was his strength among men—when you met him, that great, strong, pulsing manhood came rushing out upon you and swallowed you up in itself. And it found out the manhood in you if you had any. Why did men love him? Surely it was this: That he believed in them, sought out the manhood in them and made it respond to his own nature.

"I should like to take every freshman who comes to college, bring him before that portrait and say to him: 'There's a man that I want you to know. Look him in the face, get hold of his spirit. If ever you begin to doubt yourself come here and look at him and you'll find that he believes in you. If you have a victory to celebrate come here and you'll find that he's already aglow with it. If you have anything mean in you come here and you'll be ashamed of it and cast it out. My boy, that is a man. Love him and let him be your comrade through your college days, and perhaps you'll learn to love him as Brown men have loved him before you. Let him be your comrade through your college life, and perhaps you will learn to be like him.'

"No college can have too much manhood, and no college can afford to lose that manhood which it has. In the personality of Andrews there was and is a store of it which can never be exhausted. His spirit has poured itself into the life of this college and its influence can never be lost. If this portrait fulfills its mission year by year the old graduate will come back and look upon it and will renew the strength of his college days. Year by year new classes shall learn to know it and shall thrill with the new life it gives them. To the college of today and of all the future we offer this portrait of Andrews, the man."

"This presentation," says The Journal, "was followed by the most tumultuous cheering, which increased the longer the graduates looked at the picture, from which the flag was pulled aside."
