Students at Dismal River.
 force, which is now very busily engaged in planting pine tree seedlings in the sand-hills. The student is expected to inspire his men with the energy necessary for the planting of two to three thousand trees daily, and that means considerable work for all. Several men are kept busy handling the seedlings in the beds, and these will take their turn in the field. The men employed here are for the most part young fellows living in the towns or on the ranches nearby. While quite willing to do hard work, as they must be to remain in employment, they seem to take no particular interest in doing the work thoroughly. The student finds that he must keep after them continually or the trees will be planted in such a way that they will have no chance to win out in their struggle with the elements. A large part of the failures of trees to grow in the sand-hills may be attributed to carelessness in planting.

Beside the regular field work of eight hours, the students have some office duty each evening. Accurate data are kept regarding the work of each man employed, concerning the amount of work done on each species of the trees which are handled on the Reserve, etc., and these figures must be worked up every evening. On rainy days the boys are given odd jobs to work at.

After supper, tennis or some similar recreation is in order. There is a very good court near the headquarters building, and in the excitement of playing the students are very likely to forget how hard they have worked during the day. On some occasions they have made the midnight air to ring with a good old varsity cheer, which the natives do not take at all unkindly. These provincials seem to respect the students, merely because they are from the University, and the fortunate ones will take pride in sustaining the reputation that has preceded them to this place.
