ish merchant. The British business man glories in keeping his business just as his great grandfather left it. The American wants to leave a better, bigger business to his son than he received from his father. The American business man, therefore, the Simplified Spelling Board finds, is willing, although he may not reap any great immediate saving, to devote some trouble and money to using the shorter forms if thereby he may encourage the beginnings of a movement which will mean a better language and consequent saving of time, space and money for those who come after him. And it is to this altruistic spirit that the committee will, in great part, address its appeal for the adoption of the first 300 words.
