day after day—O, how earnestly she had longed for these privileges! She remembered the sacrifices she had made to secure the money for this college course—the long winter days in the little country schoolhouse—the monotonous calling and dismissing of classes—the sickening odor of drying mittens and boots—all these came before her with cruel vividness. With what fierce joy she had turned the key in the schoolhouse door for the last time! Then the long hot days of summer, when between intervals of cooking and cleaning she had spent such happy hours sewing out under the old apple tree! What planning and contriving to make old dresses look like new—what patching and darning and remodeling to avoid spending the precious dollars for mere clothes!

Her eyes wandered restlessly across the scarlet flowers to the grim old college buildings. What passionate devotion she felt to each! Even the massive law building into which she had never ventured, and the hospital-like dental building were objects of deep and personal affection. Could she go home and leave them all? Was it her duty to make this sacrifice changing her whole future life? It would be only three years at longest—then she was almost certain of a position in the Clinton schools where she could go home every Friday night. Surely her mother could spare her those three years!

The solemn measures of Handel's "Largo" came stealing down from the great Columbian organ. It was the hour of vesper service, and students were straggling across the campus from the various buildings. Warily climbing the stairs with the rest, Madge for a moment forgot her trouble as the words of the opening chorus met her ears. Then one of the contraltos stepped forward and sang that glorious aria, "O Rest in the Lord." Mechanically Madge read the responses, and as in a dream listened to the words of Dr. Angell and to the closing strains of the "Marche Militaire." Like spectres the students vanished from their seats; the singers also disappeared, and Professor Stanley alone remained at the organ, playing softly in the fading light.

"O Rest in the Lord—wait patiently for Him, and He will give thee thy heart's desires," repeated Madge, as she slowly walked down the stairs. "My part, then, is to rest in the Lord and wait patiently for Him. If it is my duty to go home, I will some way know it; if it is best for me to stay here, I will know that, too. And in either case I believe some 'good lies near.'"
