NATURALNESS.

At the entrance of one certain student into one certain class room last semester, he was invariably referred to in whispers, if not aloud, as "der Prediger"—and dubbed afresh each morning. He was one of these personalities that make ordinary, natural, normal people's blood run cold, one of these nice, precise, affected wooden persons who never make errors in grammar, whose vocal modulations and inflections fall with something of the lugubrious regularity of a hammer-tap on a coffin nail, say, and who really are quite horrified at a bit of slang.

back to him, thinks he is giving others an uplift, while in truth, did he but know it, his conduct has just exactly the opposite effect. If there is anything to inspire a really natural man to go hang his harp on the iron fence and proceed forthwith to make the air blue, so blue it will not clear up for an hour, it is the sight and presence of one of these animated fence posts.

Some time ago the following appeared in the Nebraskan: "The Athenaeum, the paper published at West Virginia University, gives a column in a recent issue to the discussion by a noted stock expert of laws of heredity among the Herfords and so on, then heads it all, 'Laws of Inheritance.'"

Now, in reply the Athenaeum comes back with this defense: "The Daily Nebraskan criticises the Athenaeum for giving a column to an account of a discourse delivered by a noted lecturer. To this criticism the Nebraskan gives one-eleventh of the space devoted to original matter in that issue. The Athenaeum's account of the lecture was in amount less than one-fifteenth that given to original matter in that number. If comparisons were not odious, and cutting criticisms evidence of bad taste, we would indulge in a few remarks on the inconsistencies of our contemporary."

Gentlemen of West Virginia, let us for this once and all time call your attention to the fact that there is a distinction, presumably, between the terms heredity and inheritance. What do we care how much space you devote to agriculture?

The Alpha Taus defeated the Delta Tau Deltas yesterday by a score of 5 to 1. Howard allowed but one hit, a three-bagger by Wilson, who came home on a fly out. Howard and Reynolds for Alpha Tau Omega and Drain and Harnley for Delta Tau Delta did the battery work. The Delta U's will play the Betas Friday.

They sigh, cogitate and contemplate the stars, but that is about all.

Such ones think this conduct necessary, probably, to their being good; it is natural to be bad, so they will be unnatural,—but good. Philosophy on this order is a sad blunder. It is certainly always the natural personality that exerts influence in the world. The great men of the past who influenced others acted and reacted naturally. This is true in all respects. Whether a man purposes, for instance, being either a preacher or a lawyer,—going to either one extreme or the other, that is,—he will win out in the truest sense only as he learns to meet and mix with men. And in this connection it might be said that the fellow in a profession makes himself uncomfortably abnormal by allowing his profession to dominate his life till it seems to show in his face and to run off his very finger tips.

That "good" individual, to come

Chancellor James R. Day of Syracuse University has discovered a new way of aiding students in their withdrawal from the University. The method is a simple one. Any student seen going into a cafe is supposed to have resigned from college. This saves the trouble of a personal interview with the Chancellor.

Mrs. Russell Sage has given $150,000 to the Northfield Seminary for Young Ladies. It is stipulated that this sum be devoted to the building of a chapel and a music hall.

The Pi Phi sorority at Kansas University is building a new chapter house. The specifications call for a house 30x40 feet with two stories and an attic.

The Universities of Kansas and Missouri are playing a series of baseball games. So far each school has won a game.
