OPENING ADDRESS.

"To enthusiasm he added industry. He had the ability to work long and continuously until he accomplished his end. As we look over the pages that he wrote under conditions that today we should regard as impossible for good work, we are amazed that he was able to accomplish so much. Industry is like faith in its power to remove mountains. Given a fair amount of mental ability, with unremitting industry, and there is scarcely anything that it cannot accomplish. And on the other hand, given great ability, even brilliancy, without industry, and the result is invariably disappointing.

"By far the most useful contribution ever made to systematic botany was Linne's artificial system, often called the 'sexual system.' Confessedly artificial, it had the one great merit of being easily understood, and as a consequence it soon became popular. It enabled collectors and students easily to classify and arrange their plants. It was possible by it for botanists in different countries to identify and compare their plants, since all were familiar with this easily learned system. For more than a century it served as a convenient means for the checking and storing away of the vast collections of specimens brought to European botanists from all parts of the world. It is now quite possible for us to realize how much of a saving of time and energy this ingenious system effected. Instead of puzzling over the natural affinities of a new genus of plants, the discoverer was able at once to assign it to its appropriate pigeon-hole by the simple process of counting its stamens to determine its class, and then its pistils to determine to what order to assign it in that class. The discoverer had thus more time to give to his collecting, to the elucidation of genera, and the exact description of species. And then, when in the course of time, a more scientific natural system arose, it was not a difficult matter to assign these already sorted-out genera to their natural families. Systematic botany was advanced probably a full century by this artificial system, which was in fact a great labor-saving device. I have no doubt that had it not been for this contribution of Linne's we should not today have advanced much beyond the conditions of systematic botany at the beginning of the nineteenth century."

floor. Large grates with pressed brick mantles are unique features of these rooms. The grates give a rustic appearance to the rooms, and make a very pleasant combination with the antique oak wood work.

On the third floor are the three large rooms which are to become the homes of the literary societies. Each room has a raised platform and dressing rooms at one end and a large cloak room at the rear.

The finishing touches are now being put on the interior. It is hoped that the building will be ready for occupancy by the first of October.
