

THE TRUE FAITH.

is not the role of a child. It reflects our very existence.

"There was once a man named Goodyear who had a dream about rubber. He followed the promptings of his imagination. He starved his family and lived in a most impoverished condition. But always he found a way to obtain rubber and to continue his experiments. One day he was boiling rubber in a pot when an accident occurred. A lot of sulphur was dumped into the kettle. Goodyear was vastly disappointed. But the accident pointed the way to the realization of his dream, the sulphur-rubber compound producing the result for which he had sought so long. You may say that this was an accident, not a dream. It was an accident, but it would have meant nothing to anyone but a dreamer like Goodyear.

"Revelations of all things are revelations to dreamers. While we congratulate ourselves on the substitution of realities for dreams, yet we must remember that our whole progress has come through these very dreams. They have led us at last to realities.

"Let us not be afraid of nature; let us not be afraid of science; let us penetrate the sanctuaries of both. That is the glory of our time. Let us remember this, but let us also remember the dreams which alone have permitted these things to become realities.

"So, I say to you, keep on with your dreaming. Dream of the great plain here with its vast extent of prairie and its numerous herds of bison; dream of the farm land here with all its prosperity; dream of the great state; dream of a church which shall set the spirit free; dream of an education which shall become distinct with the pulsations of life. Dream till your dreams come true. Revelations come only to the dreamer."
