large number of the licenses. By the compensating provision of the act of 1904, about five million dollars are annually devoted to retiring licenses by purchase.

"To save themselves the brewers entered politics. They have a highly organized force and are very influential. In spite of their efforts, a bill is now pending which provides for more rapid retirement of licenses. The bill provided that the licenses, instead of being regarded as permanent, shall revert to the government in fourteen years. This materially lessens their value and thereby increases the purchasing power of the compensating fund.

"The reason for the different attitudes adopted toward the question by Americans and Englishmen lies in the fact that the vested interests are much more carefully considered there than here. In America things change more rapidly. The outlook of the present bill is not bright. Yet it is possible that it will pass with an amendment increasing the retiring limit to twenty-one years. Local opinion has little chance. Nevertheless, I expect the temperance agitation to grow in strength and to be ultimately successful."
