A. H. Miller, 1907, is a ranger in the United States forest reserve with headquarters at Aspen, Colorado. The efforts which the city of Lincoln is making in investigating the commission form of municipal control and the study of the debating squad on the same subject makes the coming of Mr. Arthur Weatherly, at convocation, November 3, an important occasion. Mr. Weatherly is one of the foremost advocates of this new system and he knows his subject thoroughly.

T. R. Cooper, who took his A. M. degree in forestry last year has been spending the summer in a study of wind breaks for the United States forestry service in Kansas and Nebraska. Mr. Cooper reports in Washington, D. C., the first week in November, where he will stay about a week receiving detailed instruction regarding future work in the mountains of California. It is understood that his work in California will be largely experimental in determining the relation of various forest species to site.

J. Higgins, 1907, is now technical assistant on the Holy Cross national forest and has been successful through his intimate knowledge of both practical and technical conditions on this forest. As technical assistant Mr. Higgins has complete supervision over nearly 1,000,000 acres of land. He is at present preparing a special report which deals specifically with the different species which occur in this forest, together with their economic value and the methods of future reproduction. Mr. Higgins is paying special attention to the effects of forests on stream flow and the conservation of moisture.

NEBRASKA IS CORRECT

THEORIES HELD AT UNIVERSITY ARE JUSTIFIED.

NEED OF BETTER TRAINED MEN

An Editorial in "Experiment Station Record" Says Stations Need Men "Better Trained in Pure Science."

That the position of Nebraska is correct on the question as to what kind of training is necessary in preparation for successful experimental work in agricultural colleges and experiment stations has been shown by an editorial appearing in the last copy of the "Experiment Station Record." It has of recent years been the attitude of Nebraska that purely scientific training was of prime importance and that practical knowledge was not so vital. The editorial above mentioned is an official statement that the position of Nebraska has been found to be correct by practical experience.

Not Fully Understood.

The editorial is in part as follows: "It is time that the kind of men required for station work was now fully understood. This applies to the stations themselves, as well as to the men electing to enter that field. It applies to the experimental work of the station as a whole, as well as to its research work. The station is a scientific institution. Its work in every department must be on a basis that will command the respect and confidence of scientific men as well as of the farmers.

"The difficulty of filling positions satisfactorily is increasing as the demand becomes more exacting. Standards have changed materially in the last few years. More and more emphasis is being laid on new appointees having had broad training in addition to their college course. Less stress than formerly is laid on the practical training and experience, and more upon a thorough grounding in the principles of science and a true conception of the spirit and methods of research given the latter, a sufficient familiarity with practice to bring the investigator into touch with its problems may be acquired; but the reverse does not follow.

Change is Gradual.

"The change in character of the demand has been gradual but steady. Already it has left behind many who started out in the work originally, or even a decade ago. The development of stations all over the country has presented such differences in standards and in grade of work that in the past men with but little special training beyond the college course have usually been able to find places in the work, if they combined other desirable qualities. Gradually, however, the necessity for more advanced study of agricultural problems has become widespread.

Thorough Training Necessary.

"The men who now enter the work must be trained so that they can see the real problems and have the right perspective as to values. They must be able to make their work progressive in character and to bring it into more and more real investigation—features which aim at establishing some of the fundamental facts. Then their work will become productive. If the man lacks sufficiently broad training and perspective, he will not be able to do this creative kind of work, no matter how hard he tries. His department will mark time or the station will have to find someone to take his place. So, in selecting new men, the stations must secure as far as possible, men who have the desire, the qualifications, and the broad outlook for progressive work, even though circumstances may for awhile
