UNIVERSITY COMMENT ON TALK
OF WILLIAM J. BRYAN.

CONDEMN HIS CARNEGIE IDEAS

SENTIMENT IS AGAINST FAIR-VIEW STATESMAN.

Speech of the Democratic Leader Before the Legislature Admitted to Have Revived Opposition to Bill for Teachers' Pension.

Like the proverbial thunderbolt which hurled itself from the clear blue sky came the scathing condemnation of the Carnegie pension fund from the lips of William Jennings Bryan in the course of his address to the Nebraska legislators Wednesday.
Auspiciously launched by the favorable vote of the state senate and in the course of being wafted pleasantly through the house, the whole outlook has received a jolt that makes it impossible to tell where the matter will end.

Mr. Bryan does not believe in the Carnegie pension fund for retired teachers. He isn't afraid to say what he believes. Consequently comes the sudden and vigorous descent of his foot upon the whole proposition. The foot landed right in the midst of the nicely prepared bill approving the action of the university regents in requesting that the steel king's fund be extended to apply to Nebraska's professors as well as to those of numerous other institutions, state and private, over the country. He used all the force at his command, including a few phrases about "insidious poison," "bribes," and the like. Just what the results are to be is the question that is causing many to wonder, including not a few of the university faculty and students.

Do Not Agree.

With yesterday morning's issue of the Daily Nebraskan containing a full account of the reference made by the Great Commoner to the pension fund, the student body was informed of the action before the legislature the previous afternoon. There resulted a number of discussions and a wide variance of opinion.

From typical conversations on the matter among university men and girls, it would seem that the majority of the young people for whose moral chaatity Mr. Bryan is pleading are not in sympathy with him or the proposition of the best methods of guarding that purity. Mr. Bryan declared that acceptance of the Carnegie pensions would cause the university teacher to waver from the path of duty in educating the youth of the state to a proper distrust of gigantic organizations of capital. The university students as a whole seem to consider the more practical fact that their teachers are at present manifestly underpaid and that in the absence of any disposition on the part of the state to increase their salaries, it is fitting that they should receive the Carnegie benefit.

Favor State Action.

If assurance were given that the state would increase the teachers' wage to a point commensurate with their task and with the cost of living, the students might allow the care of their morals to lead them to go with Mr. Bryan. But under the present status of affairs, the sentiment is plainly against his attitude.

University professors, albeit they are the most interested parties to the pension idea, are keeping still about it. They believe that the only way in which they can maintain their proper dignity is in not saying whatever they may think. Undoubtedly some of them have opinions, as has been evidenced in certain bits of private conversation, but they realize that it is not for them to step into a political brawl. One university teacher yesterday called attention to the fact that Mr. Bryan had made a misstatement of fact in several instances in the pension part of the address, but further than this he would not go.
