WHOSE MOVE NEXT?
 Nov. 3, 1909.
 Editor Nebraskan: In an editorial in the Nebraskan this morning the stand was taken that those who started the motion in the sophomore class to elect chairmen instead of to appoint them were doing so from personal dislikes and prejudices. In brief, these are the reasons advanced to sustain this attitude on his part:
 I. "It cannot but appear on the surface that personal prejudice was back of the movement."
 II. The change should have been made effective at the beginning of the next semester, because
 1. By acting thus they would avoid all accusation of personal animus.
 2. If their desire were to secure a better class spirit, it could much better have been attended by avoiding all chance of personal friction.
 III. The proposal seems unjust to President Powers, because
 1. It was taking away from him a right which he understood at the time of his election to belong to his office.
 2. President Powers had already told some members that he would appoint them.
 We believe that this attitude is unfair to those sustaining the motion, for first, the arguments are based on personal views as to the motives of those making this motion, and secondly, the argument is based on certain judgments as to the advisability of such a motion. It seems permissible to argue against the motion, but to us unfair that arguments against the motion should appear in connection with an attack on the intentions of those making the motion, and prejudicing readers against the makers.
 In making this motion I distinctly excluded all committee chairmen whose appointments had already been announced, asserting that I had no doubt as to the wisdom and fairness of any appointments Mr. Powers might make; but I believed, as I still do, that if the class had a direct voice in the selection of the various chairmen they would take more interest in the class meetings and would feel a more direct personal interest and responsibility in all class affairs. Is it right then that any one, because he or she believes my method to arouse class and school spirit incorrect in theory, should therefore with no more evidence than that assert, "It cannot but appear on the surface that personal prejudice was back of the movement"?
 Then the editorial states that the writer believes that since in his judgment the motion should have been made to take effect next semester, that therefore those backing the motion were doing so because of personal prejudice. Is this a fair argument? Since we backing the motion amended it so that it only applied to this semester because the president said he had a constitutions committee to look after this for future semesters?
 But, says the editorial, "If their desire were to secure a better class spirit, it could much better have been attended by avoiding all chance of friction." Another error in judgment, therefore they must have been actuated by personal dislikes and prejudices. We will say that it was far from our thoughts that this "friction" (personal friction, I should say) would be aroused by this motion. In making the motion we took pains to avoid all personal application and in making amendments we paid every attention to the wish of the president in that, first, "those chairmen, etc., whose appointments have already been announced," were excluded, and, second, that we left consideration as to future semesters to the president's constitution committee. We would not have been surprised had the president said he was opposed to this motion because he thought it not advisable and not to the class interests; but we were astonished when he asked his friends "personally" to vote my motion down for two reasons, namely:
 1. That when he was elected he understood it was his right and one of the benefits of his office that he should appoint chairmen.
 2. He had already told several men he would appoint them.
 Up to this time there had been no personal element injected into the matter and I answered that this was not a personal attack upon the president and that I would gladly have brought this motion up before Mr. Powers' election, but lacked the opportunity of doing so because of the order of business and lateness of the meeting. Also, I did not consider the president shorn of much power as he still had the opportunity of appointing the other members (aside from chairmen) of the committees. To the second objection we urged that we could support Mr. Powers "personally" later on by electing the men to whom he had promised appointments; but as this was a matter of principle those who thought it to the best interest of the class that everyone should have a voice in these selections, should support our motion, and those who thought it detrimental to class spirit should oppose it.

 Now, it surprises me that it is argued that the motion was not for the best of the school spirit because it allowed a personal element to be injected into the discussion, a personal element entirely unexpected to those backing the motion.
 Now, what would the editor have us do? He says to see this adopted for next semester. Yet we have amended the motion already so as to leave out succeeding semesters and have done this at President Powers' personal desire because he had appointed a constitutions committee to look after that. If our motion were a good one, to arouse a better spirit by giving everybody some part in class activities, why should it not have gone into effect this semester, excluding as it did all those whose appointments had already been announced? If the president desired the class to take more interest in class affairs, unless he had a firm belief that this motion would not produce the desired result, why should he object when it was so framed as not to humiliate him, but to take cognizance of those appointments already made public?
 But now, whether the meeting was or was not adjourned, the president has announced all his chairmen. How can we proceed without being personal—as we have no desire to be—without usurping the powers of his constitutions committee or without questioning his right to announce the appointments since Tuesday.
 I ask the editor, "Whose move next?" and "What's the move?"
 Yours sincerely,
 WM. RITCHIE, Jr.
