John Westover had an accident Monday at his structural steel plant that came near costing him the permanent use of his eyesight. He was bending over a motor with his face a short distance from the fuse when it blew out, throwing a bright flash into his eyes. The sight at first left them, but after a short time it came back, but the pain was intense. Mr. Westover was confined to a dark room all day Tuesday, but on account of the cloudy weather Wednesday he was able to resume his work again by the use of smoked glasses.
