MORE TROUBLE FOR LAWS.
Commotion Among Freshman Class Yesterday.

As the freshman law class was peacefully dozing through one of its classes yesterday morning it was rudely awakened by an unforeseen accident.

A large part of the plaster on the ceiling fell without warning and caused great consternation. Some, awakened suddenly, imagined that a terrible earthquake had occurred, and they started on the run for the door and windows.

Those who sat directly under the falling plaster were the first to learn the real trouble. As the plaster fell upon their heads and sifted down their necks, they hurriedly changed their seats, holding their heads and digging the plaster from their ears.

It was some time before the class quieted down again and the professor was enabled to continue his lecture.

The meeting was made more attractive by dainty little place cards, suggestive of spring, which the practical service committee had prepared.
