 When taking a short cut to the chemical laboratory, notice the small oak tree that is west of the building. It is the "Luckey oak," and rather an interesting history is connected with it. About eleven years ago Dr. Luckey was visiting in New York City, and would often go out to one of the parks and feed the squirrels acorns that he gathered for them in the Highlands. When he returned to the university he brought with him an acorn, one that was particularly large. This he planted, and under his watchful eye the acorn has grown to a tree four feet high.
