THE "ALL-WESTERN."

Following the immemorial custom of football scribes, Walter Eckersall, Steffens, and other Chicago sport writers, have been amusing themselves—and the football world generally—by selecting imaginary teams made up of the supposedly greatest men at the respective positions, who, banded together, would prove the most efficient team to represent various sections of the football world in equally imaginary battles with any other section.

Eckersall's All-Western eleven, by some hook or crook, bears the name of Captain Sylvester Shonka of Nebraska at left guard, a position which the former Chicago quarterback thinks "Sylvie" would fill pretty well.

We do not differ with him in that regard, but we do think that when he moves Shonka from tackle to guard and puts Conklin of Michigan there, he is guilty of one of the most laughable "boneheads" we have noted recently.

Conklin is also make "captain" because, as Eckie says, "he always exhorted his men to greater efforts"—truly remarkable, isn't it? He says, further, in much needed explanation of his choice: "When a line man is discovered who can play tackle and end with the desired results, he is good enough for any team."

Shonka never played end simply because he was the best tackle in the West, and because we had in Chauner and Lofgren two men whose equal has not been seen in the Missouri valley, and whose work was not surpassed all season, in fact was far from equalled by Conklin, or any other end who played against Nebraska.

ing his first year at that, and by many was not considered as the regular fullback. His almost unanimous choice as All-Missouri Valley fullback quells all doubt in that regard, however.

Owen Frank, of course, must give way to Sauer, because the latter is a Chicago man, but this is only to be expected. College spirit must have some weight; you know, even in selecting an All-Western, but when he puts Owen on a team with Delaney at one end and Chappell at another, and a small college man at fullback, leaving Purdy, Chauner and Lofgren out of the running entirely, the thing begins to have an aspect even more comical.

But cheer up, boys, we are about to join the ranks of the big scribes. Our All-Western is as follows—The first squad of the Cornhuskers.
