

the room, for they all knew. He scrambled into his coat and, snatching his hat, rushed out, laughing, to go to her of the sunny hair who had written him to come.

I do not know what she told him. I never want to know; for when he came back all the fun and life had died in his eyes. They were dull and he spoke very little to anyone. He looked down at the carpet or into the fire when anyone was in the room.

"Penny," the Artist, came in and put his arm around Bill's shoulder as he sat before the fire that night. "Bill," he said, "I didn't know you still loved her. I thought it was one of those 'affairs.' But she wasn't meant for you, old man; she's not your kind of a girl. You understand, Bill? It was foreordained."

"Oh, I see—I see," he drawled softly. Then he laughed bitterly, kicked the fire shovel down and said, "Nope, you're wrong again, sonny." The next day he went back to the hills.

The pity of it all is that the girl really loves him instead of "Penny." It looks as if she, too, made a mistake.

The moral is very plain: Keep up your lab. work or you will flunk in the finals.

R. E. Truax, who was superintendent of schools at Shelby, Neb., in 1910-11, was re-elected by the school board of that city at an increase in salary. He was offered every inducement to come back last year, but declined to accept any offers because he wanted a university education. It was not his intention to teach next year, but being prevailed upon by the citizens and school board of Shelby to take charge of their schools next year, he finally decided to do so. Mr. Truax is a junior and is scarcely past twenty-one years of age.
