DILATORY METHODS.

Manager Hamilton of Kansas is a long suffering man. For two weeks and more he has permitted his name to be used promiscuously by the Kansas papers in connection with the Ross episode. It was reported and not denied that he made official statements accusing Stohm of fearing to meet Kansas. Over his and the athletic board's name the report was given thruout the Valley that Nebraska was afraid of Kansas, that Ross must not be played because of an agreement. Now for the first time comes the charge that it has all been a newspaper game. Yesterday he wrote Manager Reed, blaming the newspapers for misquoting him. After the thing had been allowed to run for two weeks, mind you! And in those two weeks we'll have to admit that "Manager Hamilton of Kansas" received enough notoriety to satisfy the most exacting. Verily, there must have been method in his madness.

The University maintained a strictly non-partisan attitude during the agitation in the ranks of the educators who met in Omaha this week. The faculty men who represented the University were active in the meetings of the Teachers' Association, but they did not take sides in the hostilities which broke out. This has always been the policy of the state institution, and it will continue to be as long as political and commercial rings make the organized body of school men and women a field for their activities. The Chancellor and his colleagues worked as peace-makers during the disagreement, and Harry Porter has lost his sign. He is not the first business man to suffer from University fun-makers, but takes consolation that there are others. He really didn't want the sign anyway.

It was a big canvas affair, advertising the coming Iowa game and would be worthless inside of a few days. He, therefore, is willing to give the sign up gladly if he may have the privilege of using it for the next week or so until the game has been played.

If the party or parties return the canvas no questions will be asked and it may be obtained for a souvenir after the 22nd.
