floor interrupted at times the flood of oratory. The University band opened the program with two selections that were heartily applauded by the audience. Chancellor Avery presided, and introduced the speakers in turn. The two teams occupied tables at each end of the platform. The Nebraska team was barricaded behind a double row of huge volumes, to which they referred often, quoting many more authorities than their opponents.

Summary of Debate.
 H. G. Hewitt opened the debate by explaining the question and showing that the bunk-house, transient, money-seeking immigrants now flooding the country, are undesirable as citizens. Dean Campbell, a slender, breezy young man with pleasing delivery, stated the negative side of the question, and showed that it was just this type of man that was needed to perform the hard labor of the country, that in some trades he did as much as nineteen-twentieths of the work.

Reed B. Dawson, a forceful and powerful speaker, attacked the question from the standpoint of labor, showing the harmful effect of the immigrant upon labor conditions; lowering wages and striking at the trade's union. His opponent, Donald Pomeroy, spoke of the eagerness of the foreigner to learn and stated that they could acquire knowledge more readily than the average American. "Literacy," he said, "is no test of a man's character."

Harold Prince closed the affirmative's side of the question by proving that the literacy test would affect only the unskilled, the transient and the illiterate, that it was a test easy to enforce and hard to evade, and that it was the only method of solving the problem of restriction. Harvey Hoshour, an earnest though somewhat dramatic speaker, closed the question for Minnesota by arguing for internal improvement of labor conditions, and showing that the literacy test was both arbitrary and unfair.

The rebuttal was short and snappy, each team hurling quotation after quotation in support of their theories. Inside of a few moments after the last rebuttal the judges' decision had been handed to Chancellor Avery and he announced the result to the audience, who cheered loudly and crowded the platform to congratulate the winners.

Perhaps too much credit cannot be given to Professor Fogg, who worked unceasingly to perfect the team not in force of argument alone, but in elocution as well, securing by voice inflection and the careful annunciation of words, a delivery far superior to that of their opponents.

The Judges.
 Prof. I. H. Herriott, professor of political science, Drake University.
 Prof. I. H. Loos, director, school of political and social science, University of Iowa.
 Prof. E. A. Wilcox, professor of law, University of Iowa.

Prof. Louise Pound of the English literature department has received from Dr. Otto Jespersen of the University of Copenhagen a copy of "Festskrift til Vilh. Phi Alpha Tau's Banquet.
 Following the announcement of the Iowa decision, the banquet given by Phi Alpha Tau for the teams began in earnest. After the courses had been removed, Mr. Donald L. Pomeroy, Minnesota, '14, began the toast list by a dissertation on "The Veteran of the Squad."

The toast list was continued as follows:

The Value of Debate...Prof. M. M. Fogg
 Why Debate.....H. A. Prince
 Debate at Minnesota...H. L. Gislason
 From the Judges' Point of View...

.....E. A. Wilcox (Iowa)

This was followed by an informal discussion, in which all of the team members and the judges took part.

During the banquet word was received by the Minnesota men of the loss of their affirmative team to Wisconsin at Minneapolis by a two-one decision.
