CONVOCAION ATTENDANCE.

Have you ever noticed how small the attendance is at convocation unless a special program is offered?

Only a handful of the student body are regular attendants.

One group is musically inclined and attend only when a musical number is offered, another goes only to football rallies.

The talent which is secured for convocation programs is always high class, noted professors from our own or other schools, prominent men in public life or diplomatic service, and occasionally even a member of European nobility.

In spite of these attractions the attendance averages much lower than that of other schools which have a smaller number enrolled.

At some of the larger eastern schools, one hour credit is given for attendance at chapel. The reason for giving this credit is not merely to give the students something to go for for some are so mercenary that they will do nothing without credit, but also to recognize chapel attendance as a class in which Freshmen and Seniors may both take part in. It also recognizes it as a class or course which is of as great importance as any other subject.

By giving credit the excuses of "too busy," "have to write a paper," "late for lunch at the boarding house," and similar ones, could be overcome.

A prominent professor from a large eastern college visited one of our convocations. At the close he asked if that was the regular attendance. On being told that it was, he said: "Our college has a smaller enrollment, but our regular attendance rarely falls below nine hundred."

If the students realized the educational value that can be derived from the lectures of men of prominence, the broadening influence in knowing just what other people think cannot be overestimated.

THE Y. W. C. A.

The Y. W. C. A. has taken wonderful strides this year. The work accomplished has been better and bigger than ever before. The membership is the largest it has ever been, and it is now greater than at any other university. The girls have taken more interest in it and have been more enthusiastic.

But did anyone ever stop to think that there is a tiny dynamo back of all this big force? That it keeps all those girls working and that it interested all those girls who so busily hustled in the membership campaign? Did you ever realize that this dynamo is a quiet, unassuming person who sits happily at her desk all day long, no matter whether she has a headache or is worn out or not? And that she is ever ready to encourage this down-hearted girl, or to rejoice with that happy girl, or to plan with the other enthusiastic girl? And that this person takes an inconspicuous place in every vesper service, big and little; and is always just brimming over with energy and enthusiasm?

Did you know that this person is Miss Fannie Drake, and that she is the loveliest sort of a friend? If you don't know her, become acquainted at once and see if you do not feel as all the five hundred Y. W. girls do—that she is the dearest friend imaginable.

When the Court Laughed.

Robert was an honor to the force. He did not make the acquaintance of cooks and nurses, nor did he fall asleep on duty. He was ambitious and yearned for the time when he would be able to prefix 'chief of police' to his name.

One day he arrested a man for assault. The judge inquired as to who made the allegations against the prisoner.

Stepping forward and with a sweeping salute, Robert replied, "Me, your worship; I'm the alligator."

HEARD AT A PHYSICS LECTURE.

(Professor showing lantern pictures—lights out.)

One girl, bending down to whisper in her friend's ear: "Are you going to the Ivy Day picnic?" (To herself: "I thought my lips touched someone's hair.")

Other girl (whispering in an ear that she supposed to be her friend's): "Haven't a man."

Man who had been the telephone line: "Huh!"
