ONE OF GRADUATES LOSES HIS DIPLOMA

Finally Discovered Among Those of Agricultural Students—Was to Admit Candidate to "the Bar"

"The shades of night were falling fast" when Chancellor Samuel Avery made a presentation speech in delivering the diplomas to the all-wise seniors at the recent graduation ceremonies.

He had reached the law college graduates and after commenting on the three "near lawyers," made the statement that the diploma would admit those possessing it to the bar. Of course, anyone with the ability to pass the law examinations and receive a diploma would know to what "bar" the speaker referred. The speech would have been all right for law graduates, but it so happened that in the group of seniors to be presented with diplomas were a number of agriculture college graduates. One of these in particular was seen to sit up and take notice when the Chancellor mentioned the idea of admission to the bar.

When the exercises were over the friends and admiring relatives of the graduates all crowded around to extend their congratulations and go through the customary rigamarole of "how proud we are of you," etc. In the excitement, William Ritchie, Jr., became tangled up in some way and when he disentangled himself, lo and behold, his diploma was "among the missing."

Detectives were put on the case at once, and a clue was soon discovered. The appropriator of the lost diploma had not covered up his tracks as well as he might have done, and the detectives soon unearthed his own diploma, which proved to be the one presented to the suspicious-acting agriculture graduate. With this evidence the detectives made a search for the offender, who had left early. The law diploma was returned to William Ritchie, Jr., and everyone with the possible exception of the agriculture graduate, was satisfied and happy.

The only explanation forthcoming from him was that the Chancellor was mistaken when he said the diploma would admit one to the "bar"—at least not after eight o'clock.

SPORT CLIPPINGS
