WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1915

A Nebraska legislator was overheard yesterday making a severe criticism of University students for smoking cigarettes in the city cafes. This man has probably seen a few students doing this thing and has formed his impression of the student body from them. It is so in other things. One student does something that irritates the public and all must suffer.

University people have a great responsibility. Everyone is watching them. A certain element stand ready to condemn at the slightest pretext. If they condemned only the individual it would not matter much, for then he could look out for himself. But as it is, the others are often handicapped and the cause of education is made to suffer because of the acts of a single person. Every student needs to consider the effect of what he does. An act may be all right for him, but it may react adversely upon the whole society of which he is a part.

If a certain few insist on doing things that are objectionable from the standpoint of the student body, the only remedy is an active, vigorous public opinion which will demand that these few forego their individual pleasure in the interests of all.

THE FORUM

Haldane's Mistake

The following is clipped from the Seattle Post-Intelligence:

Probably the most bitterly unpopular man in England today is Viscount Haldane, who, as lord chancellor in the present cabinet, was so hostile to every suggestion of preparedness for war that he, more than any other Englishman, is responsible for the lack of preparation which handicapped his country so largely at the outbreak of the present war. The charges now hurled against him that he was the secret friend and helper of Germany, deliberately betraying his own country, are, of course, absurd. But the damage that he and others like him did their country is no absurd fiction, but a deadly serious fact.

A hater of militarism and everything connected therewith, he deliberately deluded himself into a belief in the doctrines now preached in this country, that preparedness for war was a way to invite war. A blundering, self-confident doctrinaire, the practical results which he accomplished in limiting the military preparedness of his own country were fully as disastrous as though he had been in fact, as he is now hysterically charged with being, actuated by deliberately traitorous purposes.

We have Haldanes here. They have the some self-confident fatuousness that he exhibited. It is to be hoped that their blunders may not have as serious consequences as Haldane's.
