"A cruise, sir."
"What makes it go?"
"Its screws, sir."
"Who are on board?"

HUSKY STUDENTS FROM TECH MAKE CHARMING NURSES

Aptitude at Holding Baby's Bottle and Keeping Covers Tucked in Win Youths Working Way Through College Engagements Far in Advance

Mothers, the latest thing in nurses has been found at the Carnegie Institute of Technology.

Parents who have tried the experiment say there is nothing in the world like a six-foot, brawny, deep voiced moulder, civil engineer, or bricklayer for saring for the babies while papa and mamma are doing society. These students have proved to be gentle, watchful and charming, and their voices act quicker than soothing syrup. Six men, students at Tech, have taken up this vocation as a means of supporting themselves during their years in school. They find that after a hearty supper and after the grease has been washed from their arms and faces there is nothing quite so interesting as going to a private home and rocking to sleep the baby of that home in the absence of its mother.

Mothers from all sections of the city are booking these masculine nurses far in advance. It is understood one of them has a cradle assignment for July 4. Holding the bottle, tickling baby's feet, and keeping covers tucked in are specialties of these men. Even Director Arthur A. Hammerschlag recommends them although they have never worked in his home.

Assistant Secretary T. H. Redding, who has charge of the bureau of recommendations of the technical schools, announced yesterday there were more students seeking work than there were positions for. Several students already have left school because they could not procure work.

Mr. Redding says the men are willing to serve in any capacity and at any kind of work. Many more fear that unless they are given employment they will not be able to return to school after the close of the spring vacation which began last night and closes April 5.
