HUSKERS TAKING NO CHANCES

going to allow his pupils to develop a case of overconfidence shows a sad lack of knowledge of that gentleman's methods.

The Cornhuskers are taking no chances with the wiley Hawkeyites, and there will be no let-up in the grind until after Saturday's battle. They consider it better to run up a top-heavy score on the Hawkeyes, although some of the thrill of uncertainty must be sacrificed rather than to take chances that could have been avoided. In spite of Iowa's defeat at the hands of the Ames, there is no question but that their delegation will put an interesting exhibition, and that they will put up their bitterest fight of the season is a foregone conclusion.

There are certain rumors floating about of post-season games between the Huskers and various teams. The most prominent opponents mentioned are Oklahoma and the University of Washington. On comparative scores, Nebraska seems to have the edge on the Sooners, but the coast institution is an unknown quantity. However, such rumors spring up annually, at about this season, but usually die without bearing fruit. The long training season and expense of such a game usually more than offsets the interest it would arouse. However, this year may be different.
