arrogant neighbor, he begs his nephew Alfred to escort him to a party given by the patients of a private insane asylum. In return for this favor the uncle promises to furnish the nephew with sufficient capital for a profitable business enterprise. A street brawl engages the uncle's attention and gives Alfred an opportunity to explain his desperate position to his friend Kissling. The latter proposes that the uncle be taken to Mr. Schoeller's family hotel, the inmates of which are sufficiently eccentric to be taken for insane patients by the prejudiced and deluded Klapproth.

Act II—Evening party in "Pension Schoeller." Uncle Klapproth becomes acquainted with the idiosyncracies of the various boarders. Major Groeber, discharged from the service, super-sensitive over any reference to the army, judicial court, and women, believing himself insulted challenges Klapproth to fight a duel. Josephine Krueger, a novelist of the Bertha McClay type extracts from the amused Klapproth material for her next book, a romantic story of his life. Amalie Pfeiffer, Schoeller's sister-in-law, is convinced that she has found in Klapproth the ideal husband for her daughter, Friederike, who, however, in the course of the evening becomes engaged to Alfred. Eugene Ruempel who cannot pronounce the consonant "l" but in spite of this defect insists upon going upon the stage, recites passages from Shakespeare and Schiller. Fritz Bernhardt, an enthusiastic traveler, persuades Klapproth to accompany him on a trip around the world and binds the compact, to the consternation of all of the guests, with a present of a young leopard.

Act III—A week later all the boarders arrive at different intervals to pay Mr. Klapproth a visit in his country home. To protect his sister and neices Klapproth, who believes them all to be insane, locks them up in separate rooms of his house. Bars and bolts, however, do not prevent the spirited Bernhardt from gaining his liberty and the love of Franziska. The arrival of Schoeller precipitates an explanation and the announcement of the two engagements.
