AMERICANS DECIDING FATE OF WORLD SAYS HAMMOND

ber left Paris for the front. The string of automobiles wound their way out of Paris and soon reached Mons on the Marne. Here at the very gates of Paris the German army was stopped in the summer of 1914. The greatest army in the world was stopped by a handful of gallant French troops. When Mr. Hammond asked how it had been done the French officer shrugged his shoulders and said that God had done it. "I believe that God always has decreed that no nation who has the principles of Germany will ever be permitted to dominate the nations of the earth. I do know that the French army had something to do with it," said Mr. Hammond. With five divisions of the German army sweeping down on them the French were given the order to stand or die. They stood and the Germans were hurled back from whence they came. "Here at Mons on the Marne the liberty of the world was saved. This is the greatest battlefield in the world."

From Mons the party went to Soissons. The roads were full of horse-drawn trains of camouflaged cars hastening to Paris from whence they would be sent to Italy. The men looked older than Mr. Hammond had expected they would but he accounted for the fact by the knowledge that they had been aged by the war. At Soissons the earth was shredded by shells for miles and miles and filled with barbed wire entanglements and earthworks. Here in eight days the French exploded one hundred million dollars worth of shells.

Bourdonne Razed to Ground
Next they reached Bourdonne the first fort between France and Germany. Here where fifty thousand people had made their homes before the war there was not a soul left, not even a bat or an owl disturbed the silence. At Seville they found a plot of ground about as large as a city lot which contained 1,000 tiny wooden coffins. The soil would prove to be from 25 to 40 per cent blood and bones in Mr. Hammond's estimation.

In the presence of two great armies, neither of which was visible the party stood on a hill and viewed the ruins. Overhead they could hear the deadly whistle of the shells, the air was full of airplanes fitting about stabbing each other to death—a graphic, vivid, tragic panorama. "This is a war without glitter and glamor. This is a war in which men come to deadly grip, hand to hand in the trenches." Very pathetic was the picture he drew of the refugees who have no word in all their language for home trying to find something in the ruins on which to found their homes anew.

Visits Belgian Front Trenches
At the invitation of the Belgian king the party went into Belgium in order to get to the front-line trenches where the Americans and English were not willing to take them. They slept that night in a little village over which the shells burst all night. But so soon had they become accustomed to danger that "they slept the sleep of the just or just the sleep of the sleeping." In the morning they worked their way up to the front lines. After going down a camouflaged road they left their machines at the third-line trenches and walked the rest of the way. The party was divided into two parties which went in different directions. While Mr. Hammond's party was standing within a hundred yards of the German line they heard a crash of musketry and shells to the right. At once they were hurried back and met the other section of their party to learn that the firing they had heard had been directed against them. The only farm house they saw in this region has been turned into a Red Cross hospital and an ambulance was unloading wounded men at its door.

Mr. Hammond then told of some of the atrocities perpetrated by the Germans, things which are almost unbelievable so barbarous are they, surpassing even the Indian outrages of our early wars. He also told some of the hardships undergone by the French soldiers. There are wild ducks galore on the ponds of Flanders he told the men of sporting instincts and plenty of Huns. If you go over don't waste your ammunition on the ducks.

100,000 "Sammies" Abroad?
Mr. Hammond "guessed" that there are about 100,000 American soldiers in France now. But he explained that everything was being done as rapidly as possible. "We have to do everything ourselves. I beg the American people to be patient."

The audience which listened to Mr. Hammond was one of the largest which has attended convocation this year, the whole first floor being reserved for the cadets. The band was there to lead the audience in the singing of America and the Star Spangled Banner.
