A WORD FOR PROFESSORS

How do students in general, at the University of Nebraska regard their college professors? Do they feel awed in their presence, likening them to some intellectual being far too full of knowledge to be desirous of human companionship, or do they feel that they are real, live men and women, as the students themselves, ready to help and direct, and not to scold and find fault with others. College professors are human—and the sooner the conscientious student finds this out, the better for him.

They probably would not be able to help such students anyway. Professors themselves do not like to have students take the attitude that they cannot come to their instructors for advice whenever opportunity affords. Professors like to be congenial and to feel that the student count them as companions, rather than as learned men and women. They have the same whole-hearted desire for companionship that students have.

WHEN PERSHING CAME HOME

As Jack Pershing rode down Fifth avenue yesterday Fifth avenue's millions saw a man—a real man whose splendid vigor shone in every movement of his trim athletic body, whose fine spirit was disclosed in every glance of his far-seeing eyes, whose essential wholesomeness was revealed by the firm but not unkind mold of his features, the unrelaxing discipline of his whole body. From this tense figure radiated confidence with no bumptiousness, calm determination unmingled with bravado.

That such a figure of a man should have housed the brain and heart that built up victory for America in France was fitting. Where Pershing went the physical symbol of virile, ambitious, eager Americanism went. It was fitting that he should stand for America before foreign rulers, be they kings or premiers. It was fitting that he should stand for America in the councils of the captains of a dozen nations' armies. It was fitting that he should stand for America at the general headquarters of America's forces. It was fitting that he, soldier and citizen, should stand for America before the militarists of Germany. It was fitting that he should stand for America in the hushed chambers of the hospitals where cruel suffering sought in vain to break the spirit of America's splendid spirit of America's splendid soldiers.

The quality of a good and great man discovers itself in the disciplined and trained body of John Joseph Pershing. Body and mind and heart are American, and good to contemplate.—New York Sun.

READING OFFICIAL NOTICES

Stop, read and heed... should be the warning followed by students who no official orders come to their notice. This admonition should be especially observed at this time of the year when it is necessary to issue many instructions from the administrative offices in regard to registration and enrollment in the University.

This week much confusion has been caused unnecessarily in University Hall by students who failed to read the slips enclosed with their schedule cards. Those filing their cards late have found them returned considerably changed by the schedule approvers. The reason for this change was carefully explained in a notice from the President's office pointing out the conditions created by the record enrollment. In spite of this, the registrar has been besieged by students protesting their class assignments. All protests have been in vain, for changes were not made unless classes were filled. Much trouble would have been saved the students themselves and the clerks, who are already swamped by the work before them, if attention had been paid to the notices.

Throughout the year many important announcements affecting all students will be made in the columns of The Lantern, on the campus bulletin boards and in the mails. Those who fail to observe the advice of stop, read and heed, are going to find themselves seriously inconvenienced many times before they have completed their college course or their career in the business world.—Ohio State Lantern.
