WILL CLASS FOOTBALL BE REVIVED?

With the gradual return of university customs and traditions to a normal basis, the university public is beginning to wonder what will be done about class football this year. That this interesting form of class rivalry was dropped last year and the year before occasioned little surprise and comment. Those were war times and class activities and class sports were largely relegated to the background while more serious forms of war work took precedence.

The annual class football scrap, used to be a feature of fall sport which attracted the attention of the entire university. A spirit of competition and rivalry was engendered between all classes which worked for the good of athletics in general and added spice and zest to the gridiron game. Aside from its benefits in promoting class spirit, it provided abundant opportunity for athletics to get out and defend the honor of their class in football. Men who might not be eligible for the varsity squad but who played the game for the love of it, had a chance here.

This year there is no reason why football should not be encouraged. There is more material here than ever before and many good players would be glad to don the moleskins to help out their class. Class presidents and heads of class athletic committees should keep this in mind. It is not too early to begin now. Early practice may be a determining factor when it comes to a championship battle.

By all means let class football be revived.

THE COLLEGE DRIVES

Now Princeton has launched its drive, which is to insure that its teaching equipment shall be less inadequate, its teachers less lamentably underpaid. It is important that every American, whether or not a college man, shall realize what these drives mean.

To the individual graduates they mean an average contribution of between three and four hundred dollars. The 36,000 Harvard graduates have set out for a minimum of $11,000,000, which figures out at $305 each. Princeton, with a considerably smaller number of graduates, has valiantly placed her minimum higher, at $14,000,000. Of the graduates, moreover, fully a quarter are themselves teachers or, what is more unfortunate financially, ministers. And these drives come on the heels of a series of Liberty Loans to which as a class the salaried brain workers were faithful contributors.

To the country as a whole the drives mean something even more notable, though it cannot be expressed so definitely in figures. During the war about 75 per cent of the college graduates in service were officers. In three cases out of four, to be a college man was to be an officer. Stating the case from the opposite point of view, of the officers in our forces nearly 90 per cent were college men. In nine cases out of ten, to become an officer it was necessary to be educated. Service in wartime is, however, only an incident in the great purpose for which the colleges are maintained. With the exception of West Point and Annapolis, our institutions of higher learning are conducted for the needs of peace. Their pre-eminent service in the war is cited only to indicate how vital this peace service is. A nation without a steadily flowing stream of young men of the highest moral inspiration, of the highest mental training, would be as backward in the struggle of life as an army waging war without trained officers.

College graduates, being mainly on fixed salaries, have suffered more keenly than most from the present crisis, and it was pointed out that the nation should feel bound in duty to give just support to an institution which is obviously national in its service. The suggestion was summarily rejected. National support means political control, and the men behind the drives declared that to be morally strong and intellectually well directed our universities must be free.

There have been times of late, and there will be other times in the future, when the spirit of our republican institutions seems to have suffered at palsy; when every form of wild propaganda, inflamed by selfish interest, seems rampant, triumphant. The leaders among our men of education stand firm in the larger vision, the abundant generosity, of the true American tradition. Where they carry the standard others will not hesitate to follow.—The New York Times.
